That such appropriation shall be expended by a commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, Col. Thomas S. Hopkins, past commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac, and Capt. D. B. Mull, ex-commander of the United Confederate Veterans, of a post in Georgia, residents of the District of Columbia.

That said commission is authorized to adopt such rules for the determination of the persons entitled to transportation hereunder as they may deem proper.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION, BRUNSWICK, GA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution received this day from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 98) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Confederate Veterans' reunion, to be held at Brunswick, Ga., in July, 1913, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, a couple of words have been left out of that joint resolution which it ought to contain, and, if there is no objection, I should like to have the joint resolution taken up and acted on now and to offer an amendment of two or three words to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideraton of the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the consideration of the joint resolution is a matter of urgency, or whether it might not go over without injury to anyone?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that the tents will be needed probably next week, though I am not sure about it. The joint resolution says in July, but the exact date in July I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only point I would make is the same as that made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a moment ago, that if there is time to refer the joint resolution to a committee and have it reported back, it would be a better method of legislative procedure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to ask for the adoption of an order to print 25,000 copies of the proposed currency bill for distribution, 10,000 to go to the document room and 15,000 to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed 25,000 additional copies of Senate bill No. 2639, "A bill to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, for furnishing an elastic currency, affording a means of rediscounting commercial paper, and to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes," of which 10,000 shall be placed in the Senate document room for distribution and 15,000 shall be for the use of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he has an estimate as to the cost of this printing?

Mr. OWEN. It comes within the $500 limit, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator assures me that the expense will be under $500, and therefore I have no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield to me, I should like to inquire of the Senator if he would not be willing to change his resolution so as to provide for the printing of a larger number of copies.

Mr. OWEN. The resolution now provides for 25,000 copies.

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied that 25,000 copies will not come anywhere near supplying the demand.

Mr. OWEN. We could easily enlarge the number afterwards from the plates, if necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator made any inquiry——

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that we can not under the $500 rule go beyond the number provided for in the order.

Mr. NORRIS. Without the Committee on Printing passing upon it.

Mr. OWEN. It would have to go to the Committee on Printing, which would delay the matter, and there is already a very urgent demand for a considerable number of copies.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will find that we need at least twice that many.

Mr. OWEN. Then there can be a reprint.

Mr. SMOOT. In order to have more than that number printed it would have to be a concurrent resolution, and not only pass the House, but the Senate. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the House has already ordered 25,000 or 50,000 copies of this bill—I forget which.

Mr. OWEN. Twenty-five thousand copies.

Mr. NORRIS. But those 25,000 copies are not for the use of the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. OWEN. No.

Mr. NORRIS. The members of the Senate will not be given any of that number.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that by a resolution which was passed in the Senate not long ago, I think authority was given to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to have done what printing was necessary for the committee. Therefore, I suggest to him that if he provides 25,000 copies for the use of the Senate he has authority under that resolution to print whatever additional number the committee may need, and the matter may be arranged in that way better than to have another resolution passed.

Mr. NORRIS. That being true, if the committee has authority to print what they need, why can not the order provide that the whole 25,000 copies shall be for the use of Senators?

Mr. OWEN. I question the authority under that resolution, and that is the reason I ask the Senate now to adopt the order I have presented.

Mr. NORRIS. But 15,000 of the 25,000 copies provided for under the order which the Senator has presented will go to the committee, and will not be for distribution among Members of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I will be very glad to have that reversed, so that 15,000 copies will go to the document room and 10,000 to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be glad if the Senator will do that.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to modify the order in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the order will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed as a Senate document for the convenience of the Senate a statement or abstract prepared in regard to the bill (S. 2639) to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, for furnishing an elastic currency, affording means of rediscounting commercial paper, and to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes, which was introduced by me on the 26th instant. I ask that the statement be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency to accompany that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. (S. Doc. No. 117.)

EXPORTATION OF ARMS TO MEXICO.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I gave notice on yesterday that this morning I would call up Senate joint resolution No. 43. I now do that for the purpose of addressing the Senate as briefly as I possibly can upon a subject which I think is of the utmost importance, and which should receive, as it undoubtedly, in my judgment, merits, some immediate consideration in view of the very critical condition of affairs, growing more critical every moment, upon our southern border.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution called up by the Senator from New Mexico.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) to repeal the joint resolution of March 14, 1912, authorizing the President to prohibit the exportation of arms, etc., as follows:

Whereas the provisions of the joint resolution of March 14, 1912, authorizing the President to prohibit the exportation of arms and munitions of war under certain circumstances, and the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 14th day of March, in the year 1912, under the authority of said resolution, have been and are now being so construed by the authorities charged with the enforcement of the same as to prohibit the exportation of arms and munitions of war to one or more of the contending factions in the Republic of Mexico and to authorize and permit such exportation of arms and munitions to one or more of such contending factions; and

Whereas there has been for more than two years last past continuous strife and armed conflict between various contending factions within the Republic of Mexico and the different States thereof; and

Whereas the enforcement of such law and the proclamation putting same in effect has, as is shown by the evidence taken by the Senate committee under Senate resolution 335, Sixty-second Congress, second session, caused attacks upon American citizens residing or temporarily being in Mexico, the destruction of the property of such American citizens, the holding of such citizens for ransom, and has resulted in engendering between such and other American citizens and the great mass of Mexicans feelings of antagonism and distrust, and is destroying the traditional friendship between the people of the two countries; and

Whereas it is the desire of the Government of the United States to remain entirely neutral and to take no part, directly or indirectly, in the internal affairs of the Republic of Mexico, and to restore and maintain the friendship and good feeling heretofore existing between the citizens of the two countries: Therefore

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution of March 14, 1912, amending the joint resolution of April 22, 1898, authorizing the President to prohibit the exportation of arms and materials of war, etc., be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, Senate joint resolution No. 43 provides for the repeal of a resolution adopted by the Congress of the United States on March 14, 1912.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate, first, to the fact that the resolution of March 14, 1912, was evidently adopted under a misunderstanding of the effect of the resolution itself or of the law then in force, which it was sought to amend; second, that the object of the adoption of the resolution at that time, as expressed upon the floor of the Senate, has not only not been attained, but that the results have been diametrically opposed to those which the persons who offered the resolution stated they desired to bring about.

The preamble of Senate joint resolution No. 43 largely expresses its purpose, and I shall not take up the time of the Senate to read either the resolution or the preamble.

The joint resolution of March 14, 1912, as it has operated, has changed the law of the United States as it existed from the inception of this Government down to that date. Not only has it changed the statute law of the United States, but it has changed the policy of the United States, and has changed the rules of international law, as understood and followed by the United States and by every other country on the globe, without an exception, so far as I know. There certainly has been no action taken by The Hague tribunal, nor by the declaration of Paris, nor by any other body of which I have any knowledge, which has initiated in any country on this globe any such policy as we initiated by the passage of the resolution of March 14, 1912.

I am not going to read the debate upon this question in the Senate, which was very short. When the resolution was offered, on March 14, it was taken up for discussion immediately and was passed on the same day. It was stated in the debate at that time that the resolution of March 14, 1912, was an amendment to the neutrality laws of the United States then in force; that it was intended so to be; and that instead of increasing or enlarging the powers of the President under the act to which it was intended to be amendatory it really restricted the powers of the Executive to some extent. The statement was made that by a change of the resolution passed on April 22, 1898, a portion of our antiquated neutrality laws would be amended so as to bring those laws up to date.

The statement was also made at that time that the necessity for the passage of the resolution was that American citizens across the border in Mexico were fleeing for their lives, and that the continued exportation of arms and ammunition into Mexico would jeopardize the lives, the liberty, and the property of American citizens across the border.

I wish to touch upon these two propositions. The resolution itself, the law as it stands, provides:

That the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, approved April 22, 1898, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

Remember, Mr. President, that in the statement of the case this resolution of April 22, 1898, was directly referred to as a part of the neutrality laws of the United States, and that it was sought by the resolution of March 14, 1912, to amend those neutrality laws.

That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Section 2 has been recently passed upon directly, and its meaning explained, in a case before the Supreme Court of the United States, decided within the last three weeks. That section is as follows:

That any shipment of material hereby declared unlawful after such a proclamation shall be punishable by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

Instead of being part of the neutrality laws, the resolution of April 22, 1898, was a war measure. It was no part of the neutrality policy of this Government at all. It was adopted by the two Houses of Congress two days after the resolution was passed recognizing the independence of Cuba and authorizing and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry out the purposes of that resolution. It was for the purpose of preventing the exportation of coal from the seaports of this country to places where it might fall into the hands of the Spaniards, against whom war was declared directly on the same day. It was only about 10 days after the McKinley message calling the attention of the Congress of the United States to the fact that it was the duty of this Government to intervene in the war between Spain and Cuba, or at least in so far as the troubles then existing in Cuba were concerned. It was purely a war measure for the protection of our own Government, never dreamed of as a neutrality measure. Yet, possibly through some misunderstanding, this resolution was treated as a neutrality law, and amended so that an American person selling goods in St. Louis, Mo., to his regular customer in Matamoras, Mexico, Juarez, Naco, Nogales, Veracruz, the City of Mexico, or anywhere else, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered in the Chaves case within the last three weeks, is guilty of a crime for which he may be punished by two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary and the infliction of a $10,000 fine.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I presume the Senator will not object to interruptions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FALL. Certainly. I do not object to interruptions.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will investigate the history of the resolution to which he has referred, I think he will find that while it is true that the resolution was passed through the two Houses of Congress on the date stated by him, it was introduced some time prior to that.

Mr. FALL. Which resolution—that of April 22?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. No; that is not the case.

Mr. BACON. When was it introduced?

Mr. FALL. It was introduced in the Senate of the United States on Saturday. On Monday, I think, or Tuesday the 22d day of April, Mr. Quay reintroduced the same resolution, and it passed the Senate on that day, and passed the House on that day.

Mr. BACON. When was it first introduced in the House?

Mr. FALL. The resolution which passed was the Senate resolution. It was introduced, and then for some reason was withdrawn because of the objection of Senator Gorman, of Maryland, was reintroduced by Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, and passed on the 22d of April, as a war measure.

Mr. BACON. I do not speak from any definite recollection.

Mr. FALL. I have before me an extract from the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. My impression is that the Senator will find that the resolution was introduced in the House some time prior to that, and that its original purpose was to enforce our neutrality laws. I am not definite in my recollection, but it is my general recollection that it originated in the House.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am absolutely definite in my recollection and in my statement.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand the Senator to be definite in reply to my inquiry as to when the resolution was originally introduced in the House.

Mr. FALL. I have stated as definitely as I could. I do not know whether the resolution had been introduced in the House on Saturday or not. I know that this resolution was introduced on the 22d, and passed, and the purpose of it was expressed in the debate in the Houses of Congress. I have before me extracts from that debate, on pages 4170 and 4171, where Mr. Gaines stated "That the object of the resolution was to stop sending coal supplies to nations that are friendly with Spain," while Mr. Hull said, "That it puts it in the power of the executive department of the Government to stop the shipment of coal or war ammunitions to any place where they may likely reach the Spanish Government."

Mr. McEwan asked, "If it would not be better to prevent the exportation of these materials from any point in the United States? This simply prevents exportation from any seaport. There is remaining the Mexican frontier and the entire Canadian border."

Mr. Dockery asked, "If the resolution would apply to provisions," and Mr. Hull replied, "It would apply to anything used in war." Mr. Dockery stated that his reason for asking was "That a number of shipments have been recently made to the Spanish army by certain merchants in New York, and I was in hopes that it would be far-reaching enough to stop the trade in army supplies." Mr. Hull answered, "That will be in the discretion of the President."

Mr. President, the question as to whether this was or was not a war measure is absolutely settled by the debate in both bodies. It is immaterial whether it was introduced after the receipt of the McKinley message and after the introduction of the resolution providing for the freedom of Cuba and authorizing and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces to bring that about. The resolution for the freedom of Cuba was then under consideration in both branches of Congress and was pending. It makes no difference whether the debate was on the 20th, the 21st, or the 22d. As I have stated, this was a protective measure for the Government and not a neutrality policy to be inscribed on the laws in opposition to the policy which had been ours since 1793. Yet it was stated here, and the resolution was passed by the Senate undoubtedly on the assumption, that the resolution of March 14 was an amendment to the resolution of April 22, as a neutrality measure.

I wish to call the attention of Senators on the other side to some of the expressions of opinion as to the policy of the Government, which were so lightly set aside, I think, by mistaken action. I call this matter to the attention of Senators on the other side and Senators on this side, because the neutrality laws of this Government of ours have never constituted a partisan question.

In 1793 Thomas Jefferson wrote upon this subject to the British minister, who had made complaint that merchants and others in this country were supplying arms and munitions of war to the enemies of Great Britain. Mr. Jefferson said, on May 15, 1793:

> Our citizens have been always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means perhaps of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, does not require from them such an internal disarrangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President's proclamation, that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of any of the belligerent powers on their way to the ports of their enemies. To this penalty our citizens are warned that they will be abandoned and that, even private contraventions may work no inequality between the parties at war, the benefit of them will be left equally free and open to all.

Right here I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that policy, as announced by Jefferson, has been followed by every prominent man, by every statesman, by every official who ever spoke upon this subject, so far as I have been able to read; certainly in every declaration of every such statesman or official when such declaration was necessary upon an inquiry from any foreign power or when the question was raised on either side of the legislative branch of this Government. Never until last year, on March 14, was a contrary policy advocated for even one moment by anyone of whom I have read, or anyone of whom I have heard. The law of nations, of every other Nation but this, is now that the citizens of a nation can sell to the citizens of any other nation, whether they are at war or not. If the thing sold is contraband of war, then, of course, such contraband is subject to seizure by either of the belligerents.

But what is the condition here? Our citizens are arrested within the confines of their own country by the armed forces of the United States and sent to the penitentiary without warrant of law. The houses and the stores of our own citizens on American soil are being broken into, without warrant of seizure, by the armed forces of the United States, as happened recently in El Paso County, Tex. In that case arms and ammunition, still in the original cases, for their own protection against a threatened attack of Mexican raiders from the other side, against which we are not protected, were broken open, and such arms and ammunition were seized and taken away from the owners by the military forces of the United States. Within the last 10 days this seizure has been set aside, by order of the Secretary of War. Within the last three weeks the Supreme Court has declared that if that merchant, or any other merchant anywhere in the United States, consigns to Mexico in the ordinary course of trade a bill of goods containing arms or munitions of war, he is liable to two years' imprisonment and $10,000 fine.

Instead of leaving it to Mexico to protect herself the taxpayers of the United States have been required within the last two years to expend millions of dollars to maintain the land forces of the United States upon the Mexican border and the naval forces of the United States along the coast of Mexico, to protect some faction of Mexicans fighting some other faction of Mexicans.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is interesting in the line of what the Senator is discussing to advert to a dispatch in the morning paper to the effect that a man has been called from Oregon or Washington down to the town of Phoenix, because he carried an aeroplane across the border into Mexico. Because of that act he was brought that distance at the expense of the United States.

Mr. FALL. I thank the Senator from Arizona for calling my attention to that instance. I will say further that I am not going to instance one case after another, but the policy is that the American cattleman on his cattle ranch along the border today does not dare to live on the other side or undertake to do business on the other side with any dependence except upon himself for protection, because he knows that the United States Government has disavowed him. The consequence is that this man with his six-shooter swung around him, carrying it on the other side for the protection not only of his property but of his children and his wife, by crossing the line and depositing his six-shooter on this side and undertaking to return on business to his family, taking his six-shooter from the place where he has deposited it, is arrested by United States troops without warrant of law and turned over to the United States Government and sent to the penitentiary for two years and fined $10,000.

That is the way this remarkable neutrality law fastened on the people of the United States is operating. I shall refer as I proceed to the operation of it within Mexico itself.

Mr. President, following Mr. Jefferson, on August 4, 1793, three or four months after Jefferson's doctrine was enunciated and sent out to the people of the world, Hamilton, in his Treasury circular, wrote:

> The purchasing within and exporting from the United States by way of merchandise articles commonly called contraband, being generally warlike instruments and military stores, is free to all the parties at war and is not to be interfered with.

The same doctrine was repeated by Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, during the course of his correspondence with Mr. Adet, minister of France, on January 20 and May 25, 1796.

It has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Santissima Trinidad case (7 Wheat., 283) and in all the other cases which came before it prior to the Chavez case.

Mr. Clay to Mr. Obregon, April 6, 1827, reiterated the same doctrine, and it has been held to be the law and the policy of the United States, as well as its international law, from that day down to March 14, 1912.

President Pierce, in his message on December 3, 1854 (see p. 957); Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, in a communication to Mr. Romero on December 15, 1862; Attorney General Speed, in an opinion in 1865; John Quincy Adams, in his Memoirs; Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Lopez Roberts, Spanish minister, in 1869, and again in a note to Mr. Cushing, our minister to Spain, in 1876; Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, to Mr. Garland, Attorney General, in 1885, as well as to Mr. Becerra, in the same year; Mr. ROOT, then United States attorney at New York, to Mr. Garland, Attorney General, a case in which Attorney General Garland calls the attention of the then district attorney of New York, Mr. ROOT, to the fact that it was reported a ship was sailing from one of the harbors in the city of New York loaded with arms or munitions consigned to some person or firm in Colombia. Mr. ROOT promptly replied to him that, in accordance with his desire, he would issue a warrant for the arrest and detention of the ship, but that under the law and policy of the United States in the event it was disclosed that the arms and munitions of war were bought in the ordinary course of business from citizens dealing in such arms, then there was no authority of law under which the ship could be held.

It was so decided by the court; it was so decided by those charged with carrying out the policy of the Government at that time; it was so decided by Mr. Bayard.

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Lazcano, in 1891; Mr. Foster to Mr. Peraza, in 1892; Mr. Harmon, Attorney General, in 1895; Mr. Olney to Mr. Dupuy de Lome, on July 15, 1896, and every other official or statesman in this country without any exception until the act of March 14, 1912, which I now ask the Senate to repeal, was foisted upon this people under the statement, at least undoubtedly believed by the Senators who made it, that the exportation of arms and munitions of war to the Orozco forces in northern Mexico might tend in come way to injure Americans.

Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate at an early day after my entrance into this Chamber to the operation of this law and the effect it was having upon the interests of Americans in Mexico and to the fact that up to the time of the enforcement of this law there had been little or no loss of American life or American property in Mexico. Only in a few isolated cases had there been any attempt to interfere with Americans in the full enjoyment of their property rights and of their liberty. Not an American up to that time had been seized by either of the contending factions in Mexico or held for ransom. Since that time I could fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to overflowing with the names and dates when Americans have been seized and held for ransom by the partisans of one or the other contending factions, and in arresting them invariably the statements were made that it was in retaliation for the action of the United States in the enforcement of the act of March 14, 1912.

The whole policy of this Government, Mr. President, as was stated before in this Chamber by myself with reference to the policy of the last administration, has been absolutely wrong, clearly wrong; wrong to the people of Mexico and outrageous to the citizens of the United States who have been there and who are there.

It is said, Mr. President, that if you go across the border of the United States you take your life in your hands. We attempt to extend the trade of this great country. We tell the Japanese, the Chinese, and all the nations of the world that we would like to have their trade. "We will let you have any article of commerce at almost any price you choose to pay for it." But when our merchants send out their representatives, their business men, to reside in South America, Central America, Japan, China, or anywhere else, they go there with the understanding that "dollar diplomacy" is a thing of the past and that "grape-juice" diplomacy has taken its place. What the difference may be, I can not say; I do not know. I do know, however, that when you do state definitely to the other nations of the world the fact that American citizens residing in their boundaries can be attacked with impunity, that they can be despoiled of their property with impunity, then you strike the deadliest blow which was ever given to the trade of the United States—this great commercial Nation.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to go into matters in detail. I promised to close as rapidly as I possibly could; but I want to call the attention of Senators to the records in this case.

A committee was appointed by this body to investigate matters along the Mexican border and in Mexico in connection with an investigation as to whether American citizens had anything to do with inciting or fomenting the revolution against the Government of Diaz in Mexico. In the course of that investigation statements were obtained which are published as a Senate or a Senate committee document. Nine hundred and eighteen pages of statements were taken and are published in this record, statements of American citizens in Mexico, and every American citizen who testified upon the subject testified to the effect that prior to the passage of the resolution of March 14, 1912, their property had been practically exempt from seizure; that their lives had been safe throughout Mexico; that none at least of the armed forces upon either side—and there are a dozen different sides in Mexico—had interfered with Americans because they were Americans; that if there had been any interference it was only incident to some sporadic case of looting or robbery; that subsequent to the passage of the joint resolution American property has been endangered in every State of the Republic of Mexico, particularly in the States along the American border; that as was stated to the witnesses by the Mexican leaders, the officers of both the federal army and the revolutionists, it was due entirely to the fact that they intended to retaliate upon Americans in Mexico and hold them responsible for the action of this Government in unwarrantedly intervening as they were doing in the protection of one faction against the other; that they proposed to make the Americans there pay for the cartridges which they had to pay three times the regular price for because they could not get them across the border except at an enormous cost by smuggling.

Salazar wrote a letter which is embraced in this statement. He is the federal now at Juarez, who is leading the defense of that city against the attack of troops of Villa. Salazar has a letter here which was handed to the then President of the United States, Mr. Taft, in which he says that Americans must not come back across the border to attend to cattle branding and other business. Why this action of Salazar? Because three days before he had attacked the federal post at Palomas, which is a port of entry in Mexico, and had killed or taken prisoners all the garrison who were within a mile of our line. The federal garrison had been getting supplies, arms, and munitions from this country; it had been getting flour, meat, and all the supplies which they needed and were able to pay for. When Salazar took charge of the port and sent his wagons and teams across into the United States to buy arms and munitions and to pay with his gold for flour to feed his starving men his flour was seized by the armed forces of the United States and confiscated and the men were put in the military prison and his teams were confiscated and sold. Do you wonder, then, that when they get an unprotected American on the other side they make him pay in some measure for the damage which this Government is directly inflicting upon them?

I am speaking now of the Mexicans, but, Mr. President, I can certainly appeal to the Senate in behalf of the trade of the United States with Mexico. It is not an illegitimate trade. It is one which we have always been engaged in, one which is recognized as legitimate by every other nation in the world, and by this has been recognized as absolutely legitimate until the passage of the joint resolution.

I am simply going to put into the RECORD citations to the evidence of certain witnesses who appeared before this committee to corroborate my statement and I will not read the evidence itself. There is the testimony of E. C. Houghton, page 9. Mr. Houghton is the representative of E. D. Morgan & Co., the Bliss estates, and others in New York, and manages large, rich ranch property in Mexico. He was driven away from it, and can not go back there. He can not brand his cattle, although he was informed by a man close to the former administration that he had better make a private deal with the bandit, Salazar. He did so, and he paid Salazar $7,500 to allow him to brand his calves. After the money was paid, Salazar drove the calves off, sold them, and put the money in his own pocket. On page 65——

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator, with his permission——

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If he has a copy of the proclamation issued by the President under the joint resolution?

Mr. FALL. It is simply warning the people of the United States. I have it, but not here before me.

Mr. BACON. What I wished to ask the Senator is whether any exception was made in that proclamation.

Mr. FALL. I will have it in a moment. The Senator from Ohio is courteous enough to look for it. The proclamation, however, simply recites this act. There had been a neutrality proclamation, as in all cases of this kind. It has always been the custom of any administration to issue a proclamation to its citizens that they must observe neutrality when there was war between two foreign countries. That, of course, was issued.

Following that was the proclamation of the President of March 14, to which I have referred and which I am now discussing. Under that, millions of dollars of American property have been destroyed and 80 American lives have been lost, almost entirely attributable to this law and to this proclamation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Sixty-two million dollars, Mr. President, admitted damage had been done to American property five months ago, when I saw the last consular or embassy report—that was about the estimate.

Mr. BACON. The Senator did not catch the purport of my prior inquiry.

Mr. FALL. I understood the Senator to inquire as to this proclamation.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator was urging that the joint resolution, which is a law, was operating unjustly to some people.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. And that some were made to suffer under it while others had relief.

Mr. FALL. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment.

Mr. FALL. All right.

Mr. BACON. For that reason I asked the Senator whether the proclamation made any exceptions in favor of either party or whether if such exceptions were in practice found they were without regard to the proclamation. I have sent for the proclamation with a view to seeing whether any exceptions were made.

Mr. BURTON. It makes no exception, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. No exception?

Mr. BURTON. It seems to make no exception.

Mr. BACON. Very well. If there are no exceptions it is not the fault of the law if any injustice has been done to anyone.

Mr. FALL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he asked me some questions along this line when I spoke here in August, and I stated to him at that time and told the Senate that there were exceptions; that the Madero government was being absolutely protected and allowed to get arms and ammunition wherever it pleased; that the insurrectionists against the Madero government could not get them; and that American citizens were being shut up for selling them through a port which to-day belongs to the Madero adherents and to-morrow belongs to Orzoco, or to-day to Huerta and to-morrow to Villa; selling them in the ordinary course of business, shipping to merchants in Mexico; to-day you would be damned for selling and to-morrow praised.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I will call the attention of the Senator on this point to a specific instance. Here is an official communication from the Chief of the Coast Artillery and Acting Chief of Staff under date of June 18, 1913:

> In answer to your letter of the 17th to Gen. Wood, who is out of town, I have the honor to inform you that the arms, equipments, etc., which were turned in by the Mexican Federal troops at Nogales and Naco, were shipped to the American consul at El Paso.

We do not recognize the Huerta government, and still this Government not only allows its citizens to sell to the adherents of Huerta in violation of good faith, as I understand it, but this Government itself directly violates neutrality, as I understand the term, by delivering arms to the Huerta government. The day before yesterday—I may say to the Senator I will get the facts if he wants them—128 rapid-fire guns and two or three carloads of ammunition for shipment, through sales by American merchants, for Matamoros, Mexico, were seized by the armed force of the United States on this side and confiscated.

Why? Because Matamoros is in the hands of Carranzistas in opposition to the Huerta government. Those are the exceptions. The Senator stated two or three of them here.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the only exception recognized by the law is the exception made by the President of the United States.

Mr. FALL. The Senator knows that the proclamation forbids the shipment of arms intended to incite or foment domestic disturbance contrary or against the constituted government of Mexico. That is what the proclamation says, and that is what the law says, that whenever the President in his discretion may find shipments of arms and munitions from this country which may tend to incite revolution against the recognized government of an American State, he has it in his power to prevent it. Naturally, he has construed it not to direct him to exclude the shipments to a recognized government.

Mr. LODGE. Then, I understand the Senator to state that the examples prove the statement that we permitted arms to be shipped to the Madero government?

Mr. FALL. You did.

Mr. LODGE. But not to those in insurrection against it; and now we are permitting arms to be shipped to one government but not to the other in Mexico.

Mr. FALL. That is it exactly.

Mr. LODGE. That, I understand, is the Senator's position.

Mr. FALL. That is it exactly. I have an instance occurring under the former administration. I have in the office files an official document showing that a ship with arms going to Vera Cruz was seized by United States authorities under this very proclamation, but by order of Mr. Taft, over his own signature, was released because it was going to the Madero government ports for the use of Madero.

While this administration has not recognized the Huerta government, under the direction of somebody arms and ammunition surrendered to our troops on this side are being returned to the Huerta government, while arms and munitions bought in the ordinary course of trade, destined to a port which happens to be in charge of the Carranzista government—which is the government of the State of Coahuila and all the States in secession—shipped to Matamoras by our citizens on this side are seized; and if they choose to bring an indictment against the merchants who sold the arms in the ordinary course of trade, under the decision in the Chavez case they are subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary and a $10,000 fine.

I say to you, Mr. President, that the whole course of this Government—and I speak of this administration as well as of the last administration—has been ruinous to American interests and has been shameful, and that this act now upon the statute books is a stain upon such statutes and upon the laws of this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator what the effect would be if we pass his resolution repealing the present law? Would our merchants then have a right to sell to any one of the factions?

Mr. FALL. To anyone who would come and give his good gold; and then it would be his lookout as to whether he got them across the line. If our merchants sold them to be delivered at Juarez, and Salazar should seize them before they were delivered, our merchants would lose them, if they were to be paid for on delivery; on the other hand, if they were destined for the Huerta faction, and Mr. Carranza should seize them, our merchants would lose them. Under the neutrality law they are contraband of war and subject to be seized by either of the belligerents; but the doctrine which I am insisting upon, Mr. President, is the American doctrine, and the doctrine of the civilized world, that our merchants should be free to sell wherever they please, to whomsoever they please, taking simply the responsibility of dealing in contraband of war, which is subject to seizure by either belligerent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to suggest to the Senator from New Mexico—I do not know whether he has dwelt upon it or not—that the doctrine he is trying to reinstitute was the doctrine of this Government under George Washington's administration and has been ever since. We declared at that time that our merchants sold at their own risk, but they had a right to sell.

Mr. FALL. I am glad the Senator has made his statement. I will state to the Senator, for his information, that I have just read an extract from the official communication of Thomas Jefferson, dated May 15, 1793, to the British minister, and then Mr. Hamilton's circular, and the communications to the French minister and to all other nations and all other people. The Hague tribunal has never sought to go any further than simply to provide for the seizure of contraband of war. It has never sought to provide that any nation should not sell freely to any other nation, whether at war or not, except under that penalty.

Mr. LODGE. They sell at their own risk.

Mr. FALL. They sell at their own risk, of course, just as Jefferson said, touching contraband of war; our merchants sell at their own risk; aside from that, they shall not be curtailed in their right to sell.

I had commenced to read when I digressed, Mr. President, from the testimony in this case in the document of the committee to which I have referred, appointed under Senate resolution No. 335. I want to call attention—and I want to get this in the RECORD, so that Senators, if they so desire, can see it for themselves—to the sworn testimony of reputable American citizens as to what has been the effect of the maintenance of this resolution upon our statute books.

Those are a few of the witnesses who testified upon this direct subject. Every other particle of testimony touching the subject at all corroborates the evidence of these witnesses to the effect that until the proclamation of March 14, putting in effect this law which was mistakenly supposed to be an amendment to the neutrality law—until that proclamation went into effect, Americans, as well as citizens of any other country, were protected in their property, while since then, as shown by Mr. Fink, superintendent of the San Toy Mining Co.—an American company with 5,000 stockholders in this country—who in his little mining camp within 12 miles of Chihuahua, where the Federals claimed to have a garrison of 7,000 men, was seized and held for ransom. The Federal troops were notified at once, but refused to go to his assistance. The American consul was notified at once and wired the State Department of the United States Government. The department replied that they had wired the City of Mexico to afford Mr. Fink all protection. Five thousand troops, or, as they claimed, 7,000 troops, were within 16 miles, and yet no attempt was made to go to his assistance. He knew the men who had seized him. He spoke Spanish well. They demanded $5,000 ransom. He called upon them as friends, stating that he was a poor man, had only his salary, and doubted whether his company would put up a dollar ransom for him, stating that he had always been their friend. They said "yes," personally, and you are so now, but your Government is ruining us; the policy of your Government in intervening is causing our women and children to starve and our men to shed their blood. It is your fault. We must have cartridges with which to defend ourselves. We must buy them from some source; we must have the money with which to buy them. Your Government is depriving us of the right to buy them across the border. We pay three times the price for every cartridge because we are compelled to smuggle them. We are now buying from the Federal troops in the city of Chihuahua cartridges at 10 cents apiece. If you will furnish us with 50,000 rounds of cartridges, we will turn you loose; if you do not, we must have from you $5,000 with which to pay the Federal soldiers for the cartridges which they are selling us." That is from the sworn testimony of a reputable American citizen.

Mr. President, I do not want to weary the Senate, and I shall close by saying one or two words upon another subject connected directly with this.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, I should like to ask him whether it would not be possible, without changing any law, for the President to recall the proclamation that was issued by virtue of the particular resolution which the Senator wants to repeal?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not that give complete relief?

Mr. FALL. Absolutely; because the law is not self-acting. It can only be put in effect by the President. Of course, that would afford immediate relief. My whole insistence is that it was never the intention of the Congress of the United States deliberately to change the policy of this Government inaugurated by Jefferson and Washington. I do not believe that when Congress understands fully the effect of it and how this law is being enforced, it will allow it to remain upon the statute books; but it has been within the power of the administration at any time simply to revoke that order.

I want to say to the Senator who has asked the question, that I have had this matter up with the last administration, and I have called the attention of the present administration to the fact that such acts as these of which I have been speaking, and also allowing so-called Federal troops to go through American territory when they did not dare follow the insurrectionists through the mountain passes, allowing the Federals to take trains in safety at El Paso and head off the revolutionists going from Chihuahua to Sonora or from Sonora to Chihuahua—such acts as these have emphasized upon the minds of the Mexicans of the north that the Americans who have always been friends of those people of the north have for some reason now turned to their enemies.

Mr. President, I myself personally have done business in Mexico for 31 years. I have had as many as 5,000 of these people working for me at one time in Chihuahua and Sonora. I have lived with them in their camps; I have had my daughter and my family in Mexico in little outlying Mexican camps, where there were not two Americans, and I have left them there in absolute safety, feeling that they would be protected and that they were in no danger whatever. I am sorry to say that I can do that no longer, and I speak knowingly when I say that the change of conditions, the change in the minds of the Mexicans of the north in their opinion of and treatment of Americans is due absolutely to the suicidal and farcical policy of these two administrations.

Mr. BACON. In what particular?

Mr. FALL. If the Senator does not understand in what particular, I am afraid it is impossible for me to impress it upon him. I have been devoting myself for some little time to that attempt, and I am sorry that I am not so fortunate in the choice of language as to inform the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I accept the Senator's criticism and acknowledge my obtusity. I simply desire to know from the Senator, if I do not render him impatient by making the inquiry——

Mr. FALL. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. Whether he limits it to the criticism he has already made or whether he has anything else in his mind?

Mr. FALL. The entire policy. If you want to know what my opinion is, if that is what you are attempting to get at, as to the attitude of the present administration toward the so-called Huerta government, I can say that one thing that any Democrat and any American, in my judgment, has a right to be proud of is the fact that this administration has refused to recognize a treacherous assassin, a man who, trusted with the safety of his President and armed by that President for the protection of his so-called government—of which I had very little opinion, as Senators know—this man, intrusted with the personal safety of his President and with the protection of what government they had, should have assassinated him and taken his place.

I shall not criticize other nations of the world; they have their own code of diplomacy, but I have criticized the diplomatic actions and policy of this Government which I desire to criticize, and I am perfectly willing to yield my admiration to the present administration for its refusal to recognize the so-called Huerta government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the condition of affairs is as described by the Senator from New Mexico, so far as the enforcement of the joint resolution which he is now seeking to repeal is concerned, I understand that this Government, through its agencies along the border, is practically acting as an ally of the Huerta government, and notwithstanding its refusal to recognize the Huerta government as a government it is rendering it, perhaps, a far more valuable service in allowing it to buy and receive munitions of war from this country, while it is refusing the opponents of that government that privilege.

Mr. FALL. That is the position in which the Government is placed. I can show further, Mr. President, along that line that the Senator from Arizona and myself made certain protests to the State Department of this Government a short time ago, which were listened to to some extent, against the action of the Government in regard to the troops, to the number of some seven hundred fighting men, who were forced to cross the border at Naco and at Nogales, whipped by the Carranza forces, driven out of Mexico, and pursued to the border, Gen. Ojeda himself having been dragged across the border by an American officer, to get him away from his pursuers. They surrendered their arms to our American soldiers, were kept there and fed at the expense of the United States Government, and then started across the territory of the United States, under guard of American soldiers, to be delivered back to Huerta. The arms and munitions had already been sent to the Mexican consul at El Paso. Two hundred and ninety-four of these troops arrived at El Paso and were met by three Texas Rangers, ordered out by Gov. Colquitt, with instructions not to allow one of these Huerta troops to land there from the military train. We, as I say, protested. It appears to be rather uncertain as to what became of some of the troops. Gen. Ojeda, the hero, who had announced through the American press to the American soldiers and to his countrymen that he proposed to die in his tracks before he would surrender or was conquered, running from his pursuers, was dragged across the American line by a friendly American officer and allowed to proceed to Guaymas, and has been in charge of the defense of that city against the men who ran him out of the country at Naco.

Mr. President, the 294 troops who arrived at El Paso are still there on the military reserve at Fort Bliss, because the Texas authorities will not allow them to go off. They would not allow the Huerta soldiers to be taken from the train in the Union Station, but compelled them to go out to Fort Bliss, where they are yet, being fed at the expense of this Government.

Need I refer to other acts of invidious distinction, Mr. President, calculated to make the opposing class in Mexico rather antagonistic to the United States? It seems to me, sir, that if a case could be established that this case has been.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up any more time of the Senate than to say this: I have referred to the investigation which was made by a committee of the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate with reference to Mexican affairs. I was placed upon that committee by the Senate itself by a joint resolution passed, I believe, two days after the committee was appointed.

Mr. President, the direct subject of investigation at that time was the question as to whether or not American corporations or American interests on this side had furnished money with which to incite or foment the revolution of Madero against the Diaz Government. I want to say that after a most thorough examination of all the evidence we could obtain, and some which it was impossible for me to place in the hands of the committee, coming from private sources which I would not dare to name and can not name to-day, I not only became convinced that no American company, corporation, or individual in this country had furnished the money with which that revolution was brought about, but I became convinced, and have evidence absolutely conclusive to myself, as to where the money did come from.

I have been anxious that the committee might get together and consider some of these matters, and, if possible, arrive at some conclusion. In view of the fact that the committee has not met for that purpose, I simply desire now to make this statement as strongly as I can make it. Our American business interests are being attacked from different directions at this time. If I, by my testimony, can show that one attack upon them at least has not been well founded, I feel it my duty, not only as a member of the committee but as a Senator, to refute such charges.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a matter of very grave importance, and I presume the joint resolution will go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. At least, I shall ask that it shall do so. Before making that motion, however, I wish to say a word with regard to the matter which has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from New Mexico, in order that the record may be correct.

It is true that the conditions now are entirely different from those which existed at the time the resolution of March, 1912, was adopted. At the time of the adoption of the resolution in March, 1912, there was a duly recognized Government in Mexico, of which Madero was the head. The revolution which was in progress presented the distinct aspect of a revolution by a portion of the people who were attempting to overturn an established and a recognized government. There is no doubt about what was the purpose of the Congress in the adoption of this resolution. The purpose was to discourage revolution in Mexico. The Senator from New Mexico is entirely mistaken if he thinks this resolution was adopted inadvertently, or without a distinct and direct purpose to be accomplished by it.

The Senator would indicate, from his criticisms upon what was done at that time, that the purpose was only to protect American citizens who were across the border by refusing the export of arms which might be used against them, and he now says that that purpose has been so signally defeated that the directly opposite result is now flowing from the operation of this law. The fact is that this resolution was adopted in consequence of communications which came to the United States Government, and I may say to the President of the United States, presented by the authorities of the State of Texas. At that time, I repeat, Madero was the recognized, legitimate head, and his Government the recognized, established, and legitimate Government of Mexico.

It was represented to the President of the United States by the authorities of the State of Texas that the territory of the State of Texas was being used as a base where revolutionary organizations were being made, and from which revolutionary expeditions were being sent, for the purpose of disturbing the peace and overthrowing the authority of the established Government in Mexico, and that that was having the effect not only of putting in jeopardy the lives of Americans who were beyond the Mexican border but of creating disturbances and endangering life and the safety of property in the State of Texas.

Upon that representation, the President of the United States—and I do not think I am violating any propriety in stating these facts—sent for the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I was then as now a member, but of which then the Senator from Illinois, Mr. Cullom, was the chairman; and most of the Senators who are now members of that committee were then members of it. The matter was one which was recognized not only as affecting the United States in general but as affecting particularly the State of Texas. While the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations were invited to go to the White House for the purpose of conferring with the President on the subject, the two Senators from Texas were also invited to be present, and were present. This emphasizes the fact which I have stated, that the complaint came from the authorities of the State of Texas, that the territory of Texas was being used for illegal purposes with a view of destroying a recognized and an established government.

There is no doubt, as I say, about the purpose of the resolution. It was to prevent the shipment of arms and munitions of war from Texas into Mexico, the design of which was to revolutionize that Government and to disturb the peace and overthrow the laws of that country.

As I say, the condition has changed. There is now no recognized government in Mexico so far as this Government is concerned. I am very frank to say, as I have said elsewhere, that I think the determination reached by our Government in that particular is a proper one, for the reason that in my view the Huerta government is as distinctively a revolutionary government as is the government which is headed by a Mexican chieftain whose name I do not now recall in the northern part of Mexico. We have now presented the condition of two contending factions in Mexico, neither of which we recognize to be the established government of the country, and each of which is perhaps entitled, the one as much as the other, to whatever privileges recognition may confer in the way of opportunities offered for carrying on the war.

That is a matter to be determined. It is a question whether or not it is to the interest and best policy of this Government to prohibit to any of the parties in that country the opportunity to secure arms and munitions of war for the purpose of carrying on the internecine war, or whether the door should be thrown open and each should have the same opportunity that is afforded to the other.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator so far with a great deal of pleasure, and I should like now to ask him a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has had a great many years of experience, as he says, in diplomatic matters. Would it be contrary to all the rules of diplomacy if he would tell the Senate now just what he thinks about this matter and what ought to be done under the existing conditions?

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean as to arms?

Mr. FALL. I mean, first, as to the shipment of arms; second, as to the matter of the treatment by this Government of its citizens who are in Mexico.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator asks me a question which it would take me a good long time to answer, if I were to give all the views which I think I might possibly entertain, or do entertain, as indicating what we should do there in each particular. If the Senator means to inquire of me whether I think the Government of the United States ought to intervene in Mexico, I shall be very prompt to answer his question.

Mr. FALL. I did not ask the Senator for his reasons. I asked him if he had any opinion. That would not take long to express.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator will pardon me, but he can not put me in a position which I do not occupy. I have said nothing about reasons. I said if the Senator desired me to give my opinion as to whether or not the Government of the United States should intervene in Mexico, I would give it to him very promptly. Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. FALL. Yes; the Senator understands it. I did not ask for any such opinion, however. I asked the Senator for answers to two distinct questions. I did not ask him for his opinion upon either of those matters, but simply as to whether he could answer those questions; and, if so, whether it would be contrary to his ideas of what was true diplomacy to give me answers to them.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, at one moment the Senator says he is asking me for my opinion and not for my reasons; and, then, when I propose to give him my opinion he says he does not ask me for my opinion. Therefore, I must confess, I am a little at a loss to know how I am to answer the Senator's questions.

Mr. FALL. Then I might ask, making the distinction which the Senator understands, as a lawyer, between a decision and an opinion, whether he has arrived at a decision on any phase of the Mexican question except that the United States should not intervene?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. I make that distinction between a decision and an opinion because I do not want an opinion.

Mr. BACON. I have not the right to decide the matter, consequently I shall insist on giving my view as an opinion, with all due deference to the very fine and metaphysical distinction drawn by the learned and distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

In my opinion a citizen of the United States in Mexico is entitled to exactly the same protection that a citizen of the United States in any other country is entitled to when he gets into trouble—no more and no less. I do not think it is practicable for the Government of the United States to go into Mexico and extend its physical protection to a citizen of the United States, and redress his wrongs in Mexico without armed intervention. I know of no way in which the Government can physically extend protection to a citizen of the United States in Mexico, or redress wrongs by force and compulsion in Mexico, other than by force and intervention. Possibly the Senator from New Mexico does know some way in which that can be done.

Mr. FALL. No, Mr. President; if the Senator will yield for a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The American people in Mexico have not asked for intervention, Mr. President. They have asked that the present diplomatic policy of the United States be done away with just for a little while, and that we go back to true Jeffersonian and Hamiltonian principles in our diplomacy.

Mr. BACON. Diplomacy can not enforce anything in Mexico or anywhere else outside of the territory of the United States Government. Diplomacy may secure redress, but not through force. Diplomacy stops when force begins to exert its power. Everybody knows that. Fine words can not make a distinction which does not exist. Therefore, I say that while it is our duty to extend in all possible ways our assistance to citizens of the United States in Mexico who may be in trouble, we can not undertake by force to give protection to a citizen in Mexico except by armed intervention.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to announce that the Chair seems not to be addressed, and has not been today.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair is quite correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator speaks about diplomacy and the inability to enforce it. As a general proposition of course that is quite true. But under treaties and general international law we, in common with all other nations, have certain rights in regard to which it is possible for diplomacy to do a great deal.

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. A short time ago a German was killed in Mexico, and his wife and I think a child or some one else with him, under circumstances of the most revolting cruelty. Through the German minister, without any threat of war, but through diplomatic methods, they got within a few days, as soon as the facts were known, an indemnity of 100,000 marks for that German and his family. If I am correctly informed, some 80 Americans have been killed in Mexico, and I do not know how much property has been destroyed. If we have received any indemnity, either under the last administration or under this administration, I have failed to discover it.

Mr. BACON. All that may be true.

Mr. LODGE. Diplomacy can do a great deal after all.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts before I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to add another matter to that which has been stated.

Mr. BACON. The statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts in no wise conflicts with the proposition submitted by myself. That is, that it is the duty of this Government to do for any citizen of the United States who may be within the territory of Mexico just exactly what it would do for any one of its citizens in any other country when that citizen got into trouble, and that whatever can be accomplished by diplomacy or any other method short of force should be accomplished. Possibly the Senator was not in his seat when I made that statement, or I would not have been the subject of his criticism.

Mr. LODGE. No; I was not. I simply heard the Senator's last statement. But if the Senator will permit me, and then I will not interrupt him again, my complaint is that all that diplomacy can effect——

Mr. BACON. Should be done.

Mr. LODGE (continuing). Which is very much when it is backed up by its own government, as the consuls and ambassadors ought to be, has not been done in Mexico. Our consuls have not been backed up. On the contrary, I am certain that they have received in times past—I will not say under this administration, but under the last, perhaps—a very definite warning, the old French warning, "Not too much zeal." My contention is that we have not done all we ought to do through diplomatic and consular channels.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean, when he uses the term "backed up," that they should be backed up by other than diplomatic methods?

Mr. LODGE. I do not.

Mr. BACON. Then there is no trouble between the Senator and myself.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. BACON. I go as far as he does.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Suppose diplomacy utterly fails?

Mr. LODGE. That is another question.

Mr. BACON. When diplomacy fails, then it is a question whether or not force shall be used.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. One moment; let me reply to the Senator from Arizona. I will give the Senator from New Mexico all the time and all the opportunity he wants.

The Senator from Arizona asks what shall be done in case diplomacy fails. When diplomacy fails, it is then always a question for every Government whether or not the controversy is one which will justify a war or whether it shall be submitted to arbitration. Those are questions to be determined when the contingency arises. The time certainly has not yet come when we can say with propriety that we will go to war with Mexico or decide that we will submit the matter to arbitration. There is no authority there with whom we can arbitrate; and the time has not come when, by reason of the injuries which have been inflicted upon our citizens, we should resort to war.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, how long, then, would civilization permit to go on the crimes which are constantly being perpetrated there, and we the nearest neighbor? I believe that was the excuse given for our intervention in Cuba—that crimes against all the laws of civilization were being committed.

Mr. BACON. The Senator means to inquire how long we shall stop before we intervene by force. Is that the meaning of the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How long it shall continue.

Mr. BACON. Is that what the Senator means when he asks how long it shall continue? Does he mean how long we shall permit it to continue before we make armed intervention in Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, that brings me to a suggestion which I did not intend to make, but which I think the question of the Senator from Arizona and what has been said by the Senator from New Mexico probably justifies that I should make.

ASSIGNMENT OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2251) to amend chapter 1, section 18, of the Judicial Code.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS TO MEXICO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) to repeal the joint resolution of March 14, 1912, authorizing the President to prohibit the exportation of arms, etc.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think the question of the Senator from Arizona should be replied to. I think the Senator has put the matter in a shape which was evidently in the mind of the Senator from New Mexico, but the Senator from New Mexico would not come square up to the scratch. That is the difference between them. The Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Arizona evidently desire that this country should intervene forcibly in Mexico and endeavor by its Army and Navy to reestablish order. Mr. President, that is a very large proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. I was replying to the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to say that the Senator puts me in an attitude that I do not entirely entertain. I was asking for information from the large experience of my friend the Senator in such questions as to how long a civilized country can sit idly by and see its citizens murdered and its property destroyed; its sailors from its own battleships on the streets of a city, when unarmed, shot down by officers or alleged officers of that country. I was asking the Senator's judgment.

I will also add that the destruction of their own property has gone to a point where they are now utterly unable to respond in damages for what we have already suffered from them. How far, I ask, under those circumstances shall it go before the last resort must be had?

I was not giving it so much, as the Senator supposed, as my present purpose to advise intervention in Mexico, but rather to get the Senator's idea as to how long we should delay before the last step is taken.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator when he recites certain facts as a predicate for his inquiry means only one thing, and that is whether under the circumstances narrated by him the time has come for intervention. So there is no difference, at least, between the question as I presented it and the question as propounded by him now.

I can not go that length, Mr. President. But I just want to say one thing. In the first place, everybody who gives this matter any reflection recognizes that intervention in Mexico does not mean a temporary incursion or a temporary occupation. It means an occupation of that country by a great American Army to stay there for a generation, and then in all probability, and in the judgment of those who have given the matter the most thought, for all time. We should certainly give ourselves pause before we do that.

It is an easily demonstrable proposition that it would be much cheaper for the United States Government to pay not only for every dollar of damage that has been inflicted by these disorders in Mexico upon the property and persons of American citizens, but also to pay for every particle of property owned in the Republic of Mexico by American citizens than it would be to go to the expense which would be involved in a war of that kind, interminable as it would be, and involving consequences which would necessarily revolutionize our own institutions, besides imposing another great pension list the burden of which would be borne by our people for two generations to come.

Mr. President, as to what we will do in Mexico I want to say one word, and I will be glad if the Mexicans themselves can hear it. It is that the responsibility is upon them for the restoration of order in that country and for the erection and maintenance of a civilized and an orderly government, capable of enforcing law and of putting down revolution.

And, Mr. President, what I particularly want to say is that there is but one thing necessary to be done to accomplish that, and that is for the better class of the people of Mexico—those who have the education, those who have the social standing, those who have the property—to be willing to take their lives in their hands for the purpose of maintaining order in their own country.

It is a fact, Mr. President, if my information is correct, that the class of people of whom I have spoken are not willing to take their lives in their hands for the purpose of maintaining order, of enforcing law, and maintaining established government in that country; that men who have property, white men, the intelligent classes, the social classes in Mexico, sit back and are unwilling to take arms in their hands for the purpose of establishing order in Mexico. Whenever they are willing to do that there is no trouble about their establishing order in Mexico. If that were the condition in this country, there would be white men who would take arms in their hands and risk their lives and shed their blood for the purpose of restoring order and maintaining good government; and order can be restored and good government can be maintained in Mexico whenever the white men of Mexico are ready to risk their lives for that purpose.

Mr. President, I have made some inquiry about this matter. I have asked how many white men there are in the city of Mexico. I am told that there are between two and three hundred thousand white population in the City of Mexico. That means at least 40,000 white men between 18 and 45 years of age who can be enrolled in an army, and 40,000 white men, if put into an army, can rule Mexico under present conditions. Forty thousand organized and disciplined white men, intent on restoring good government can easily put down the roving bands of revolutionists in that country.

I have inquired how many white men there are in the Republic of Mexico. I am told that there are three and a half million white men. I am told that of the entire three and a half million it is only here and there that a white man can be found who is willing to risk his life for the purpose of restoring order in the country. They are sitting back in personal security and letting brigands, because they are nothing more, enlist all the revolutionary, anarchistic elements in that country, people who like the license of war and plunder and ravage under the forms of war; and it is nothing in the world but brigandage. They are perfectly willing that their country should be tramped and marked from one end to the other by these irresponsible bandits, and they sit back in security in their clubs and in their city residences and on their estates and are unwilling to take arms in their hands for the purpose of defending their own country against anarchy and rapine and unbridled license.

When the men who own the property, the men of social and business standing, the men having the most at stake, are not willing to spill their blood to protect themselves and their property and social institutions they are calling upon the United States Government for help. They would involve us in an expenditure of untold treasure and have this country shed its blood for the purpose of establishing government and maintaining law and order in that country when they themselves are not willing to take the risk that they demand of us for that purpose. When these white men in Mexico do their whole duty and fail, when they take their lives in their hands in an honest effort to save their country and fail, then it will be time enough to look to us for aid.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Let the Mexican people hear us, and let them know that it is known in the United States that the men of position, the men of property, the men of social standing, the men who pride themselves on their lineage are not willing to take their lives in their hands in order to have good government in that country, and that they are sitting back supinely and asking the United States Government to do it. For one I shall never agree to it. I do not know whether I have made myself definite or not. The Senator from New Mexico talks about my dealing in diplomacy. If that is diplomacy, let us have some plain talking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know what white people the Senator refers to in the Republic of Mexico. As to the white Americans in Mexico, there are very few of them citizens of that Republic.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking of them at all. I did not have them in my mind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Of the Americans there, a large number are poor people working for wages on property there belonging to Americans. As to the people of Mexico, as far as my observations have gone and from what reading I have done of that country, it is a question of pure jealousy between the leaders of the parties and as to which one should do the ruling.

Mr. BACON. Exactly; and the men who should do the ruling, the men who should decide matters, are carefully taking care of themselves and trying to take care of their property, and particularly, above all things, trying to avoid the spilling of a drop of their own blood. That is what my information is. If I am wrong, if it be true that the white men of Mexico are not thus abandoning their duty, if it be true that they have arms in their hands, of course that presents a different question; but I understand that about the only white men in the field are generally leaders of these revolutionary bands, or aspiring to be such. If I am misrepresenting them, I am ready to retract it in the same place where I have made the charge.

Mr. President, I do not believe there will ever be a question about the truth of it, because I have made this inquiry from men in position to know, and I am told it is a fact that the men who have property, the men who have education, the men who have social standing, the men who have most to lose by revolution and most to gain by a well ordered and established government, will not take arms in their hands for the purpose of endeavoring to secure conditions in Mexico which would make their lives and their property safe and their institutions in harmony with that of other civilized nations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator in reference to the joint resolution that is now before the Senate whether, in his judgment, the United States Government ought to treat the two present contending factions in Mexico the same, as far as permission to buy and transport arms and ammunition from this country is concerned?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to speak frankly to the Senator. I prefer that that question shall be carefully considered by the committee. I do not hesitate to say, though, speaking personally, that in the absence of a recognition of Huerta and in the belief which I entertain that his government is as much of a revolutionary government as that of the government now organized and having arms in the field in northern Mexico, in my opinion, we should, as far as practicable, equalize conditions between them.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, we are not doing that at the present time.

Mr. BACON. If we are not, it is not due to the joint resolution of March 14, 1912.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably not.

Mr. BACON. That is what I wanted to call attention to. The joint resolution of March 14, 1912, does not make any difference between them. If the joint resolution is being complied with, there is no authority for any distinction between them, because the proclamation of the President prohibited the shipment of arms and munitions of war and did not distinguish between one party and the other party.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand there is a discrimination now.

Mr. BACON. Not under the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but under the operation of the joint resolution and the proclamation of the President there is a difference made between arms and ammunition going to the so-called Huerta government and the so-called insurgent government; and if there should be a difference, would it not follow that the Government logically ought to recognize——

Mr. BACON. If there is any difference it is the difference being made by the Executive order or by those who have charge of the enforcement of the law, who are doing it without Executive order, but it is not due to any defect in the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I might be wrong about it, but as I understand the situation it could have no legal effect until put in operation by the proclamation of the President, and the President did issue such proclamation, and it is under that proclamation that the discriminations take place.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not by virtue of the proclamation, because the proclamation does not make any distinction. It may be done in violation of the proclamation.

Mr. BACON. Perhaps it is in violation of the President's proclamation. Very well; that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede it is. The question I was trying to get the Senator's opinion on is whether under existing conditions the two contending factions in Mexico should not be treated exactly alike by our Government.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator will bear witness to the fact that I have answered that question.

Mr. NORRIS. I rather think the Senator has.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is repeating it as if I had not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator answered it, but said several other things incidentally that indicated to me at least that he had not answered it, and I wanted to call his attention particularly to the question.

Mr. BACON. I wish to say simply this, that while that is the present impression upon my mind, and it appears to me to be just and right, at the same time it is a matter of such gravity that I would not be willing to act without the careful consideration of the committee which is specially charged with the consideration of questions of that kind. I might be the only member of that committee who thought that way. I do not know. I think, anyhow, that the matter should be very carefully guarded, because we must bear in mind the fact that the origin of the joint resolution was dealing with an evil in the State of Texas, and it came before the Congress of the United States through a representation made by the President of the United States in consequence of an appeal made by the authorities of Texas. So we have not only in the question what regulation shall be made to look to the question of justice between these two contending revolutionary factions, but we have to carefully guard the interests of our own people, not only in Mexico but more particularly our people on our side of the line, because every man who goes on the other side necessarily goes there with a knowledge of the fact that he takes a risk when he goes in any country of that kind.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FALL. I notice on page 3258 of the RECORD of March 13, 1912, a statement made with reference to the joint resolution in which the name of Texas is used, and then the purpose of the joint resolution is set forth. I stated this, I think, in my opening, and I will read it from the RECORD. The statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and it was the only statement made with reference to it, was the following:

> The situation in Texas is such that it does not admit of delay for the purpose of the general reform of our neutrality laws, and the people of Texas are deeply interested in having this extension of power to the President made immediately.
> With the extension of the application of the joint resolution from seaports to all places in the United States, the committee thought it was advisable to put some limitations upon the power which is included in the existing law, and so the power of the President to forbid the exportation of arms and munitions has been limited to countries in which he finds that domestic violence is being promoted by the procurement of arms and munitions of war from the United States. At the same time a penalty is affixed for the violation of the prohibition.
> The conditions are such that thousands of Americans in Mexico are now fleeing from their homes there and are abandoning their occupations, their mines, their manufactories, and their business because it is necessary to do so to prevent their lives from being destroyed by arms and munitions which are being sold and transported across the border from the United States.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is true; but it is also true, as stated by me, that the initiation of this matter was due to an appeal by the authorities of the State of Texas, and that, in recognition of that fact, when the President of the United States invited the Foreign Relations Committee to meet with him in the White House, with the Secretary of State present—I am not sure that it was the Secretary or whether it was one of his assistants, but certainly the State Department was represented—it was recognized by him at the same time that Texas was so immediately interested in it that the Senators from Texas should be invited to be present, and that they were present at that conference.

Mr. President, I merely want to say one other word in regard to the condition in Mexico and the responsibility resting upon the men who have the greatest stake in that country, to wit, the men who have the property, the men of intelligence, the men of education, and the men of social standing. As I have said before, in a discussion of this matter, it was suggested to me, when I spoke of the failure of the white men in that country to take arms in their hands and establish a government and maintain order, that they were scattered. It was then I made the inquiry as to the respective numbers, and I asked "How many are there in the whole of Mexico?" I was told there were about three and a half million white men in Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me until I finish that statement—I have not quite finished—I will then yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I suppose the Senator wants his statement to be correct.

Mr. BACON. I will yield to the Senator at the proper time, but not in the middle of a sentence.

When it was suggested that they were scattered I then asked the question, "How many are there in the City of Mexico?" I was told there were between two hundred and three hundred thousand. I take up the calculation where I left it off, that there is right in the City of Mexico an army large enough under present conditions, and in view of the character of the roving bands which kick up all the fuss in Mexico and keep up all the disorder and revolution, there are in Mexico City itself enough white men when organized to restore order and to establish a proper government; but when you come to talk about the entire white population of Mexico—and in this I have no reference whatever to Americans, but I am talking about Mexicans—three millions and a half of white people mean, at the very lowest calculation, a half million of men between the ages of 18 and 45 years; and who doubts the fact that that half million of men—interested in the property of that country, vitally interested in the establishment and maintenance of good government and in the enforcement of the law—if they are ready to take arms in their hands and use them, can restore order and establish the good government in Mexico that some are now indirectly or directly appealing to us to establish for them.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Georgia seems to object, Mr. President, and I have no further desire to interrupt him. I will later make a statement which I think may possibly cast some light on the subject.

Mr. BACON. I did not catch what the Senator from New Mexico said.

Mr. FALL. I said that the Senator, it seems to me, objects to the Senator from New Mexico interrupting him.

Mr. BACON. That is an utterly unwarranted statement.

Mr. FALL. I leave that to the record, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. I objected to the Senator interrupting me in the middle of a sentence, but stated to him that I would yield when I got through. The Senator well knows the fact that I do not object to his interrupting me.

Mr. FALL. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I have not addressed the Senator nor opened my mouth except after addressing the Chair and having recognition of the Chair and the Chair asking the Senator to yield, and then the Senator would invariably break in with the statement that he did not want to be interrupted at that time. That is what I have reference to.

Mr. BACON. But with the promise that the Senator would be yielded to and be permitted to interrupt, and he has been so permitted. When the Senator intimates to the contrary, he is not justified by the facts.

Mr. FALL. I disagree with the Senator from Georgia; that is all.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for just one moment? I want to put a statement in the RECORD if I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of talk about the condition of affairs in Mexico, the wealth of Mexico, and so forth, and the property interests of Americans. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the statement from the official records of the State Department—I will say that it is not exactly accurate, as I happen to know, but the proportionate amounts are approximately correct—as to the total wealth of Mexico and who holds it.

As to the total wealth of the Republic of Mexico, Mr. President—remember, now, that this leaves out very largely the land holdings and the land lot values—the Americans have $1,057,770,000 worth of property, and the Mexicans themselves, including all the real estate, town lots, and property of that kind, have $792,187,242. Of the total valuation of the property of Mexico to-day Americans from the United States own 48 per cent, while the Mexicans own less than 28 per cent. You would relegate us to diplomacy to recover our money through taxation, taxing ourselves 48 per cent to pay back to ourselves the money and the property of which we have been deprived.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a full schedule taken from the consular reports in the office of the State Department, and, if possible, I should like to have it spread upon the record for the information of the Senate. It contains the American, English, French, Mexican, and all other totals and percentages of property owned in that Republic by the Mexicans and by other people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

The schedule referred to follows.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there are 500,000 white men in the Republic of Mexico who are not defending their homes and charging themselves with the maintenance of order, I apprehend that the trouble is that they are not armed. Unless the blood is peculiarly untrue to itself there, I can not account for the situation in any other way.

This debate has drifted very far from its moorings. The resolution offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is merely to repeal a resolution passed on March 14, 1912. So far as I am concerned, although it appears in the RECORD that I asked the Senator from New York a question concerning it, I did not apprehend that anything was being done except the strengthening of the neutrality laws of the United States. I had no idea that the time-honored neutrality laws and customs and practices of the United States were being repealed by an amendment to a war measure which was passed during the Spanish-American War. I should like to see the country go back to the principles which actuated it from the beginning and say to every American citizen, "You have a perfect right to sell arms or any other contraband of war, provided only you do so with the notice given you in advance"—which was given very far in advance, because I believe it was in the first year of George Washington's first administration, or, if not, the second year—"that you do your selling at your own risk." That is all there is involved in this joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I repeat that I recognize that conditions have changed. It may be that this is a proper resolution to be adopted, but it ought to be carefully considered; and I have moved therefore that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution by the Foreign Relations Committee, and, therefore, of its reference to that committee; but I do want to say that I am not a member of that committee, and I differ from some of its members very materially. I do not think that they understand, nor have they investigated, the conditions in Mexico and along our border. The conditions are exceedingly critical there. The Senator, I am going to say, will find himself in a position where he does not want to put himself nor put the United States by invoking just such action as he has been talking about now. You will have just such action before you want it, in my judgment, unless something is done to relieve the tension, and unless that is done soon, Mr. President, I fear that we are going to be dragged into a very much more serious situation than the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has the remotest idea of.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator is probably not aware of the fact that the Committee on Foreign Relations have had considerable information in regard to this matter and have heard at length from parties who are well informed and who have been living in Mexico, one of them particularly, at the instance of the Senator from Arizona, who brought before us a very intelligent and well-informed man, identified with one of the largest industries in Mexico, who was heard at great length. We have also had others before our committee, but we will be very glad to have still further information; and I will say to the Senator that there will be no disposition on the part of myself, nor do I believe on the part of any other member of the committee, to delay a report in regard to this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have no purpose or intention of prolonging this debate. It has arisen unexpectedly to me, and what I may say here now must carry with it my confession of unpreparedness to properly discuss a question of such profound importance, not only to our southern sister Republic, with whom we have so long lived in amity, to our mutual advantage and happiness, but still more is it important to the honor and dignity of the United States and our responsibility to other nations and to the peace of the world. I have very pronounced opinions about the Mexican situation, but I shall endeavor to suppress the expression of much that I should like to say at this time, hoping that in the more quiet atmosphere of the Committee on Foreign Relations or in executive session of the Senate we may temperately reach such conclusions as is demanded of Congress by the unhappy and unfortunate conditions now confronting us. I want in the outset to say, in justice to my place on this floor as well as to the just sentiment of those who sent me here, that I share fully their opinions in regard to our previous course in the Mexican imbroglio, and I share the shame they feel when I see the course our Government pursued in failure to promptly and adequately act in protection of the lives and property of our citizens doing business in Mexico and at the invitation of that Republic and under the double guaranty of its law and the treaty obligations which subsist between that Republic and ours. Both the laws of Mexico and the treaty with us demanded fair and decent treatment of our citizens domiciled within her borders. This has not been accorded by Mexico. It should have been enforced by the United States. This could have been done in the first place by our Government assuming its ancient, time-honored, and proper attitude, by open proclamation, that the United States stood ready to protect its citizens on any inch of the globe, and that all force necessary would be used for that purpose.

Instead of that Mr. Taft warned, by proclamation, all citizens of the United States domiciled in Mexico to offer no resistance to any outrage but to peacefully get out of that country. This was tantamount to an invitation to Mexico to drive them out if the Americans failed to follow the advice of our President. Mexico accepted that invitation, acted on it, and, against every precedent of international law, against every dictate of justice, against every sentiment of modern civilization, that Republic proceeded to drive our people like flocks of sheep from their homes, their business, and their last dollar of hard-earned property. The homes they left behind were destroyed, their crops ruined, and, penniless, hungry, and almost naked, they stood on their native soil, the objects of and the slight beneficiaries of our Government's charity. These people needed no charity from our Government; they deserved and should have had its protection. No better citizenship ever left our land or returned to it under such degradation.

Since the advent of Madero and the usual revolution attending any accession to power in that country our citizens have been appealing to the executive branch of our Government for that protection guaranteed by every civilized nation to its citizens, but their cry has been unheeded, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has well said, "there has been a lack of even any sort of energetic diplomacy."

That our Government has often requested the Mexicans to cease their aggressions has been the most warlike, bristling, dangerous statement yet made, so far as I have been able to hear or see. I am not now criticizing the present administration, for it has inherited these difficulties and mistakes; but I make bold to suggest that the time has come for energetic and, if need be, drastic measures to secure the lives and property and peace of our people in Mexico.

The Democratic Party long ago wrote glorious history in defense of American citizenship. I confess to a prideful love of the old doctrine—the American historic doctrine—that a peaceful American citizen, obeying the law of the land where he is sojourning, has a right to expect and will receive from his home Government all proper protection, regardless of cost or consequences.

A government unwilling to go this far deserves the censure of its citizens rather than the love, the pride, and the devotion otherwise so generously accorded.

Mr. President, I have no feeling of antipathy against Mexico. I have reason for kindly feeling toward that unhappy land, for many of its people are personal friends of mine. I wish it no harm; but, on the contrary, desire to see and welcome its peace and happiness. Modern civilization, however, demands not only of Mexico, but of all nations, that needless and brutal and bloody war must cease within their borders. Civilization demands that Mexico should be pacified; that a civilized government should be permanently established there. And I believe it can be done without our intervention, which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] seems so much to fear or dread. In my judgment this can be accomplished by now, and at once, correcting the mistakes made by the Taft administration.

The Romero revolution against Diaz was aided by that administration, in that it permitted the alleged rebels to buy contraband of war supplies and whatever else they saw fit to purchase, free from any restraint or embargo imposed by our Government. When the revolution against Madero broke out, all at once our Government stood behind him and refused to permit any supplies—even of bread and meat—to be purchased by the revolutionists; these men, in large numbers, being the very men that fought in the ranks of Madero and had rebelled against him even as they and he had rebelled against Diaz.

I believe that if the Taft administration had acted in the rebellion against Romero as it acted in Romero's rebellion against Diaz not one life in twenty of peaceful American citizens would have been lost nor one dollar in the hundred of their property destroyed. But, be that as it may, we are confronted by great duties and equally great responsibilities at this very minute, responsibilities which must be met with firmness and justice, or even greater and more fateful problems will force themselves on us for a more tragic solution. If we longer daily—I forbear, as I fear to look on the unfolding drama. The time in utter fullness has come for a warning to Mexico, couched in no uncertain terms, directed to the inhabitants of that country under whatsoever leaders they act, regulars or revolutionists, that no further hand shall be laid in oppression on any peaceful citizen of this Republic abiding in their land, nor shall his property be taken from him except at the peril of our national displeasure, which will involve at last the decree of full satisfaction from the aggressor. Long ago such warning should have been given. If unheeded then, its penalties should have been enforced. It is a rotten, decayed Americanism that would excuse its failure of proper protection to its citizens under the easy plea that they had no business in Mexico, that they only went there to better their own condition, and that they should flee and leave all behind them when so directed. The Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock to improve their condition. Every man not born in the Western States went there for the same purpose. Every man of us has a right to go when and where he pleases for the same purpose, unless restrained by the laws of the country wherein we seek temporary domicile, and knowing that over our heads in all our lawful wanderings our country holds the shield of its protection. Outrages have been committed there against Americans that no money compensation could adequately measure. From correspondence as well as from the public press I am assured that men have been murdered there because they were Americans. That was their only crime.

As far as I know no compensation or redress has been demanded, no apology ever asked, and none certainly ever offered. These unspeakable outrages were visited on Americans because they were citizens of the United States, unshielded by their home Government and left, indeed, naked to their enemies. This statement is justified by comparison with the treatment accorded other nationalities similarly situated.

The Senator from New Mexico assured me the other day—if I fully remember his statement—that in the case of certain outrages on Chinese domiciled in Mexico, provision had been made by that Government to pay adequate and satisfactory damages to the Chinese Empire—or Republic, as now denominated—for the unwarranted assault on its subjects. This indemnity or redress was to be paid out of the loan then being negotiated by Mexico.

Of all the Americans killed in Mexico no offer of redress has been made, no excuse offered, no apology forthcoming. The inference is that China was more exacting in the face of national insult than we were, or else Mexico had more respect for China than for the United States, and made proper amends, out of a sense of decent duty to a friendly nation. These Chinamen were in Mexico just exactly as our citizens were in Mexico. Germany furnishes a more conspicuous example of national pride by collecting at once 100,000 marks for damages done several Germans in Mexico who were in that country under exactly the same circumstances and national guaranties that our 75 or 80 citizens were, who have been similarly killed by Mexicans and not one cent paid by Mexico or even demanded by us.

A still more conspicuous example claims our attention. In two battles between the warring factions in Mexico, one in Juarez opposite the city of El Paso, the other at Agua Prieta the little Mexican town just across the line dividing it from the city of Douglas, Ariz., many American residents of these two American cities were killed or wounded. American soldiers were near the line at both places.

They warned these factions not to fire across the line into our towns. No attention was paid to this warning. It was met with the usual contempt shown to us on all occasions. The then Secretary of State, when appealed to by the wounded and the representatives of the dead for redress, directed that those citizens wounded in their own town on American soil must first seek redress in the tribunals of Mexico before any right of diplomatic adjustment could arise. This monstrous proposition I met as best I could by introducing and having passed through this body a resolution creating a board of investigation, composed of officers of the Army of the United States, who proceeded under the terms of the resolution to El Paso and Douglas and took testimony and made findings as to the damages caused by this wanton violation of international law. On return of the report the Senate passed a bill to pay to the injured, out of our Treasury, the amounts found by the board and thus make the claim one by our Government against Mexico. The bill failed in the House, and at this session is again before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate for action.

These incidents are cited to show that we have been long suffering and patient under boundless provocation. These outrages must cease. For the safety of our southern neighbor, for her prosperity and peace, I warn her, as I warn the Senate, that these intolerable outrages will have to stop or terrible reprisals will sooner or later follow.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Are the State authorities not capable of dealing with the Mexicans who came on this side of the line and committed the crimes to which you refer?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator evidently did not catch my statement fully. The Mexicans did not come on our side of the line; and if they had, I am sure the State would, as the Senator suggests, have found itself not only capable but quite willing to deal with the situation. The damage to our citizens was caused by the reckless firing of the Mexicans across the national line into our cities, and this after due warning from our people and the commanders of our troops stationed at these places. Right then and there was the time for our soldiers to cross the line and teach a lesson reviving the memory of Buena Vista, Sierra Gordi, Monterey, and Chapultepec. This should have been followed by the warning that wherever an outrage was thereafter committed against an American citizen in Mexico the United States would not only demand redress but would, if necessary police with its soldiery the disturbing district to prevent similar recurrences.

Mr. President, what is to be the ultimate result of these frightful disturbances? Where and how will justice find a solution of the problems already presented? To the people of Mexico let us accord a proper desire to meet all international requirements by paying all proper damages to the injured sojourner within her gates and to the business interests which she has invited to her development. How are these damages to be paid? When are they to be settled? What revenue is to be found—from what sources raised—to meet the millions of dollars of damages suffered? As stated by my friend the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] over 40 per cent of all the property in the Republic of Mexico is owned by American citizens, while much of the remaining property there belongs to citizens of England, France, Germany, and Spain, with all of whom we are thus far happily on terms of perfect peace. I waive for the time any discussion of the Monroe doctrine and the obligations it may impose by demands of any of these powers on Mexico for redress of grievances and payment of damages. I think I discern some complications which it might be well to consider in advance.

In case we demand, as we surely must, that Mexico pay reasonable damages for wanton injury to life and property, where will the money come from? Inasmuch as fully two-thirds of the property in Mexico is alleged to belong to other people, then money derived from taxation must result in America, England, Germany, and Spain paying taxes on their own property to recoup the loss occasioned by the destruction of most of it. The property of our own citizens must be taxed to pay back to themselves the damages sustained by them. By the time they had paid themselves from such sources nothing of theirs would be left to tax.

I have no desire to proceed further. I have said this much merely as a warning to the Senate, and especially as a warning to the Republic of Mexico if, perchance, my words shall reach that far. I repeat that civilization and humanity demand the pacification of Mexico. Pray God that Mexico herself may find in herself virtue and courage enough to accomplish speedily that great result.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator how he explains the fact narrated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that when a German subject was killed in Mexico and demand for reparation was made the Mexican Government promptly paid an indemnity to Germany, while it seems that numerous American citizens have been killed and no reparation whatever has been made?

One further observation: A citizen in my State, with a partner or two, has $400,000 invested in Mexico. He went to Mexico a while ago to look into that matter and to make some inquiries. He asked a gentleman, I think in Mexico City, to introduce him to a Mexican official. The gentleman said to him, "I will introduce you as a German, but not as an American. If you want any favors, you must not come here asking them as an American." He said he was introduced as a German, and as he has a name that sounds somewhat like a German name he received courteous treatment, although his property had been practically destroyed. How does the Senator explain the difference?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator, before he takes his seat, tell me when that conversation occurred? Did it occur recently?

Mr. GALLINGER. Very recently.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This year?

Mr. GALLINGER. This year.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is as simple as any proposition can possibly be. They have respect for Germany. Our treatment and our actions in that behalf have been such that they have no respect for us. When the commander of the German war vessel went to the Madero Government and told it that there had been an outrage committed on a German citizen, he demanded in the name of the Emperor indemnity for it. He was told, so I have been informed, "Congress is not in session and we can not pay without warrant of Congress." He replied: "Well, I will not go back on board my vessel until I get it." He got the 100,000 marks.

What did the people that you and I know ever get from that Government for similar damages?

Mr. President, our people did not go as wild adventurers into Mexico. Every inducement was held out by that Republic to American capital. We were invited there under promise direct of full protection. Our people accepted the invitation in good faith, and carried millions on millions of dollars, and spent it in paying labor an unprecedented wage in developing the great resources of that country. And when all this money and the labor of years besides is turned to Dead Sea fruit, gentlemen here say to us we had no business going there. But these retorts come from a class of men who never went anywhere. And Jamestown and Plymouth would mark all American progress up to this hour if men only such as these had sprung from the loins of those heroic pioneers who braved the unknown deep and established the first settlements on the eastern shores of this continent.

Particularly was this invitation of Mexico extended to the members of those Mormon colonies who settled on land granted by the Republic, and to whom every guaranty of protection was accorded. These men were American citizens, and in all our land there has not been found a more frugal, industrious, courageous, law-abiding citizenship, and in all Mexico there was no settlement that did more by example to teach the natives the art and the value of agriculture, and the equally important lesson of obedience to law, the rewards of honest industry, and the happiness of peace.

These men and women were not afraid of work, nor were they afraid of foes. They had the will and courage to defend themselves against brigands and robbers. But after they had through years of toil established comfortable—yes, prosperous—homes they were told by our then President not to resist any aggression, but in case of any trouble to come away and leave behind the accumulation of years of patient toil. Thus admonished they could not resist and were driven back penniless to our shores. Their houses, as I have before said, were destroyed; their stock confiscated in mere wanton, devilish malice; their household furniture was demolished, carpets cut in shreds from the floor, and the land which they had made to bloom was left unto them desolate. No protest from our Government was ever made to Mexico as far as I know. If made, it was never heeded. Their condition on returning to their native soil was such that common justice forced me to appeal to Congress and persuaded Congress to give from the Public Treasury many thousand dollars to relieve their hunger and clothe their nakedness. It was humiliating to our national pride to so use the national funds, and far more humiliating to these brave and self-reliant people to be forced from necessity to accept it. These men, some of them burdened with the weight of many years, are starting out again where in youth they started, to provide, if may be, a shelter from the storms of their last days. In the light of these facts do you wonder why the ordinary Mexican in Mexico has no respect for an American within her borders, and equally as little respect—yes, worse than that, actual contempt—for our Government? This is mildly illustrated by their offer to pay $500 for each American killed by the Mexicans firing across the line into the cities of Douglas and El Paso.

In vain does the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] appeal to the patriotism of what he designates as the white men of Mexico. It will not move them to action in the pacification of their own country, nor will his impassioned appeal to their patriotism protect one American life in Mexico or guarantee one dollar of American property against extortion or confiscation. If their own patriotism does not avail to protect themselves and their property from violence at the hands of their own neighbors, how worse than vain it is for us to hope that protection will be accorded to our people.

Mr. President, the question is grave and urgently presses for a quick and just settlement. Under present conditions we can not recognize the present Government. We are equally prohibited by various reasons from recognition of belligerency. One thing to my mind is sure and clear, and that is that the order issued by President Taft preventing our trade in anything we please with Mexico or any of its citizens should be rescinded. The resolution presented by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] should be reported to the Senate and passed at once. If we refuse to give due protection to our own citizens, we should at least permit them to buy and bear arms for their own protection. If Huerta can not suppress insurrection in Mexico, why should we lay embargo on American trade with the people of Mexico? A tragic comedy of errors—if you will permit the paradox—has attended our whole dealing with this delicate subject. It is up to Congress to act. While I hope without hope that this Congress will adjourn at an early date, I further and more earnestly hope that before it ends we shall give to this question the consideration that national self-respect and common civilization so urgently requires at our hands and some means other than taxation of the injured may be found to pay the damages inflicted.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator deprecates the possibility that when damages are paid, a large proportion of the indemnity money will be raised from taxation upon property owned by Americans in Mexico. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from what other source the money is to be obtained for the payment of indemnity, except the source of general taxation on all property in the country?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, we had one other settlement with Mexico before. The question does not even need an answer.

Mr. BACON. What I mean is that the Government itself can not get the money to pay indemnity except in the very way the Senator deprecates.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; it has other ways of payment.

Mr. BACON. How?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I were going to have my way, I would make an arrangement of this kind with Mexico, if the Senator wants my real opinion about it——

Mr. BACON. Yes; I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would take, under an agreement with them, the Colorado River, which is already troubling our people, under an order of one of the departments, from its mouth clear up into Colorado. I would extend the line of Arizona from the corner of New Mexico straight to the West until it struck the northern part of the Gulf, and I would make provision with Mexico to take in southern California.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, from these sources—and if these are not enough, I would have enough more added to the northern boundary—let our Government itself realize the money to pay the damages which our people have already sustained, and which Mexico is unable to pay otherwise.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I am very glad I asked the Senator the question, because we now know exactly what he is after. Before that I was a little troubled to know how an indemnity was going to be had which would not include in the burdens imposed the proceeds from taxation upon property situated in that country which belongs to American citizens; but the Senator has made that plain.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator fully.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It may be, but I do not understand the Senator from Georgia fully.

Mr. BACON. The Senator now proposes to take a big section of that country. My opinion is that whenever we yield to such appeals as we have now and undertake to police—which means nothing else than invade—that country by an armed force, we are going to take not only the particular little section that the Senator refers to——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I protest against the language of the Senator. I did not say that. I did not say "take."

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I said I would make an arrangement, if possible, with the Republic of Mexico whereby we would be put in possession of, or "take," if you please, under that restriction, this particular part of her territory. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Is the Senator ready, then, out of the magnificence of his desire to see that we maintain perfect relations with that country, to vote out of the Treasury of the United States, unequivocally, damages for the people of the United States that have been outraged in Mexico?

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Undoubtedly not? Then how are you going to get damages for our citizens outraged in Mexico?

Mr. BACON. I suppose that when we get them it will have to be in the way of money received by the Government of Mexico from general taxation. But I understand the Senator's proposition to be—I do not know what word to use in the place of "take"—to get in some way, without taking, the northern quarter of Mexico as indemnity.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is not a proper statement. I never made any such statement as that. I did not include one one-twentieth part of the northern quarter of Mexico in my statement.

Mr. BACON. I was mistaken about the geography, then.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, this colloquy reveals the different sentiment prevailing here. No Senator here feels a sympathy deeper than mine for the present unhappy condition of Mexico. No man here or elsewhere desires more than I to see our sister Republic prosperous, peaceful, and happy. Yet, while animated by this desire for her glory, I owe an equal—yea greater—obligation to our citizens and our own honor as a Nation. No conquest of Mexico could add anything to our renown; no war with her is necessary if her people will cease depredations on our people and make reparation for damage already done. Civilization demands this.

The common dictates of humanity require it. Decent respect for our rights would secure safety and peace to our citizens domiciled in Mexico. Such decent respect must be accorded. These depredations must cease or the consequences and all responsibility for them must rest on the offending country. This is no time to daily. Any further delay in enforcing our just demands for peace and order in Mexico—for the security of life and property of our citizens there—to provide for the settlement and speedy adjustment of damages already suffered by us is the urgent demand of the hour. Further nerveless protest will be as unavailing as all such supplications have been in the past. Further temporizing is hazardous. Peace is sweet and above most things on this earth to be desired, but when purchased at the price of honor or maintained by shameful submission to injustice and wrong it ceases to be desirable, commendable, or decent. War with all its horrors is far better than peace at such a price. But we do not want war. We desire to avoid it. Unjustified war is as brutal, degrading, and devilish as that now being waged all over Mexico. What are they fighting about? Not one in ten of the deluded followers of ambitious adventurous leaders are guided by any principle of government or devotion to any cause. In this maelstrom of destruction the death or dethronement of one leader gives no relief to the situation, but only tends to prove to deluded followers that revolution is their only profitable employment and robbery and pillage their only asset. These conditions will continue until outside power or influence shall change it. It devolves on us to use that influence peacefully but firmly and to the extreme limit, and, failing in this, then as a last resort use with equal firmness the power necessary.

Mr. President, to evade the conclusion that might arise in some minds from the colloquy between me and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that I was in favor of taking by force any part of the territory of Mexico as an indemnity for damages to our citizens, I wish to make clear and explicit exactly my position in that regard. I infer that Mexico recognizes her obligations to foreigners within her territory, and like all civilized nations will pay willingly all just claims for damages when fully and properly ascertained, and inasmuch as all collections from export and import duties have been pledged by the Government of Mexico to the payment of certain loans, and as money raised from direct taxation of property would largely impose the burden of paying these damages on the very persons who suffered the wrongs, that Mexico would not be averse to making a settlement of all claims by ceding certain lands to us in full settlement of all our claims, and if need be, enough for us to assume and pay all just claims of the other foreigners damaged in Mexico. This seemed to me and now seems the most felicitous and easy way for Mexico and for us to find an honorable way out of our difficulties. Hence I suggested that arrangements might be effected with Mexico to that end and to our mutual advantage. Beginning at the corner of New Mexico and prolonging the international line on a due west course to the Gulf would take only a fraction of sparsely settled territory from Mexico and of little value to us, except giving, as it would, control of the mouth of the Colorado River. These negotiations or such arrangement would be futile unless we also obtained title to Lower California, of very doubtful value to Mexico but of very great advantage to us. If such arrangement could be made peacefully with Mexico, it should at once be done. If continuing outrages on our citizens in Mexico shall at last break the back of our long-suffering patience and intervention with consequent war follows, then on final war indemnity the grant of the country lying north of a line from the mouth of the Rio Grande to the southern point of Lower California would be far less than a reasonable concession. But we do not want Mexico nor any part of it. We do want peace and security there, and Mexico must establish it.

Mr. President, there are other grave questions surrounding the present case that must not be evaded. On our interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, no matter what opinion may be entertained by other powers, we are in a serious degree involved with England, Germany, and France, who have claims similar to ours against Mexico, but without the right to seize, if necessary, territory in settlement of the claim or hold any permanent possession in Mexico in collection or satisfaction thereof.

By some writers of great reputation in matters of international relations and international law the Monroe doctrine is a standing intervention by the United States in the affairs of the American Republics. In his strictures on the Monroe doctrine, Bonfil, page 157 of his Le Droit International Public, says:

"This declaration is contained in a message addressed to the Congress of the United States December 2, 1823, by President

Monroe, on the occasion of the struggle of the Spanish colonies for independence. The message contained two declarations, the one without object to-day, which relates to the colonization of the American Continent, the other which refers to the attempts made to replace the Spanish colonies under the yoke of the mother country. Monroe has taken the opinion of Jefferson. Authors have interpreted the meaning of this message differently. In our eyes at the end of this message the United States poses as protector of the entire American Continent. The message admits the interference of the United States in all American affairs, North and South. Far from being an act of non-intervention, this declaration is itself a formal intervention. The President resorted to menace to prevent European States from mixing in the quarrel existing between Spain and her colonies. Pradier-Fodéré says very justly 'that in declaring that the great Republic considered as dangerous for its tranquillity and its security all attempts on the part of European powers to extend their political system to any part whatever of the American Continent, he (the President) mixes indirectly in the interior affairs of the Republics of the New World other than the United States; he makes intervention by anticipation and to the profit of the Union, for to prevent other Governments from intervening is to intervene.'

"The effect of this message was notable. Public opinion was not deceived as to its true import. Since then the United States has invoked the Monroe doctrine to mix in the affairs of Central America. It was also recalled in the French intervention in Mexico and at the time of the cession of the Panama Canal by Colombia. Secretary Blaine, in a circular of October, 1881, and a dispatch of November 19, 1881, strove to prove that the Isthmus of Panama and the canal destined to pierce it should be under the exclusive control of the United States. In 1881 the United States wished to prevent Chile, the conqueror of Peru, from annexing a part of Peruvian territory. In 1886 the United States intervened in the affair of the island of Crete. In January, 1889, a vote was taken in the Senate upon a proposition of Senator Edmunds with a view to recalling to the European powers the fact that the Monroe doctrine was still in force. The message of President Harrison was conceived in the same spirit. (New affirmations of the Monroe doctrine were had in 1895 and 1896 in the dispute relating to the boundary between Great Britain and Venezuela, and in 1895–1897 in the Cuban insurrection against Spain. The part which the United States in 1903 seemed to have taken in the establishment of the Republic of Panama, in consequence of the refusal by the Colombian Parliament to ratify the treaty concerning the Panama Canal, is also to be noted.)"

If we adhere to the doctrine here enunciated, I fail to see how we are to escape some responsibility to the powers holding claims against Mexico. If peace is not speedily restored, I can not see, in the light of our obligations to ourselves and to the other powers interested, how we are to avoid intervention, how much so ever we may hate to take that step. With not one-half the provocation offered by Mexico, we did not hesitate to intervene in Cuba and force a war with Spain. Our causeless seizing and senseless holding of the Philippines has taught us a lesson of patience, but all the direful results of such occupancy has not absolved our obligation to protect our citizens from brutal wrongs wherever perpetrated. Our intervention in Cuba was placed on the grounds of humanity and protection of commerce; and though this extreme cause for intervention has never been recognized by the best authorities on international law, yet it was justified by the high purpose animating the act and by the actual facts of the whole case as then presented to the world. This intervention was foreshown by President Cleveland, who, on December 7, 1896, in a message to Congress said:

> When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge. Deferring the choice of ways and methods until the time for action arrives, we should make them depend upon the precise conditions then existing, and they should not be determined upon without giving careful heed to every consideration involving our honor and interest or the international duty we owe to Spain. Until we face the contingencies suggested or the situation is by other incidents imperatively changed, we should continue in the line of conduct heretofore pursued, thus in all circumstances exhibiting our obedience to the requirements of public law and our regard for the duty enjoined upon us by the position we occupy in the family of nations.
> A contemplation of emergencies that may arise should plainly lead us to avoid their creation, either through a careless disregard of present duty or even an undue stimulation and ill-timed expression of feeling. But I have deemed it not amiss to remind the Congress that a time may arrive when a correct policy and care for our interests, as well as a regard for the interests of other nations and their citizens, joined by considerations of humanity and a desire to see a rich and fertile country, intimately related to us, saved from complete devastation, will constrain our Government to such action as will subserve the interests thus involved and at the same time promise to Cuba and its inhabitants an opportunity to enjoy the blessings of peace.

On April 11, 1898, President McKinley sent his now famous message to Congress on which ensued the War with Spain, which broke the shackles of Cuba, but put the yoke of our domination on the neck of the Filipino.

That message is so appropriate to present conditions that liberal citation may not be amiss.

The President said:

> As to the first, it is not to be forgotten that during the last few months the relation of the United States has virtually been one of friendly intervention in many ways, each not of itself conclusive, but all tending to the exertion of a potential influence toward an ultimate pacific result, just and honorable to all interests concerned. The spirit of all our acts hitherto has been an earnest, unselfish desire for peace and prosperity in Cuba, untarnished by differences between us and Spain, and unstained by the blood of American citizens.
> The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring States have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds. It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.
> The grounds for such intervention may be briefly summarized as follows:
> First. In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door.
> Second. We owe it to our citizens in Cuba to afford them that protection and indemnity for life and property which no government there can or will afford, and to that end to terminate the conditions that deprive them of legal protection.
> Third. The right to intervene may be justified by the very serious injury to the commerce, trade, and business of our people, and by the wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island.
> Fourth. And which is of the utmost importance. The present condition of affairs in Cuba is a constant menace to our peace, and entails upon this Government an enormous expense. With such a conflict waged for years in an island so near us and with which our people have such trade and business relations; when the lives and liberty of our citizens are in constant danger and their property destroyed and themselves ruined; * * * all these and others that I need not mention, with the resulting strained relations, are a constant menace to our peace, and compel us to keep on a semiwar footing with a nation with which we are at peace.

Substituting the word "Mexico" for "Cuba" in this message, you have a temperate and underdrawn statement of present conditions in Mexico.

Mr. President, I have before me a most valuable contribution to the volumes of learning on international law, written and compiled in the Solicitor's office of the State Department, from which I cite instances where we have intervened with force of arms for the simple protection of American citizens.

This was the purpose of the landing of forces in China, 1854; Uruguay, 1855 and 1858; China, 1859; Africa, Kisembo, 1860; Panama, 1860; Japan, 1868; Uruguay, 1868; Egypt, 1882; Korea, 1888; Navassa Island, 1891; Chile, 1891; Hawaii, 1893; Korea, 1894; Nicaragua, 1899; China, 1900; Santo Domingo, 1903; Honduras, 1907; Nicaragua, 1910; Honduras, 1910 and 1911.

Several times we have landed our troops on foreign soil to punish for the death of American citizens. This occurred at Sumatra in 1883, Fiji Islands in 1840, Samoa in 1841, Fiji Islands again in 1858, and Formosa in 1867.

We in times past have not hesitated to invade other countries to punish for insults and injuries to American citizens or American officers. As instances we refer to our action in Porto Rico in 1824; Falkland Islands, 1831; Nicaragua, 1854; Fiji Islands, 1855; China, 1856; Japan, 1863; and Korea in 1871.

For securing indemnity alone we landed troops on the island of Johanna in 1851, Japan in 1864, and Haiti in 1888. As early as 1817 we invaded the Spanish Floridas to protect American citizens.

Our history is loaded with examples of our landing on foreign soil to simply protect American interests, and we should have repeated that history by landing troops in Mexico as soon as it became evident that Mexico could not or would not give protection to American lives and American property within her borders. Such invasion by us for such purpose is not a declaration of war, nor is it tantamount to such declaration, nor could it under the circumstances be justly construed as an act of hostility. Such action is rightly based on a higher law than is found in international codes, for it rests on the natural law of self-defense, as dear to a proud nation as to a brave man. Hall, in his work on International Law, sixth edition, page 264, recognizes the principle in the following language:

> There are, however, circumstances falling short of occasions upon which existence is immediately in question, in which, through a sort of extension of the idea of self-preservation to include self-protection against serious hurt, States are allowed to disregard certain of the ordinary rules of law in the same manner as if their existence were involved. This class of cases is not only susceptible of being brought under distinct rules, but evidently requires to be carefully defined, lest an undue range should be given to it.

Oppenheim has more tersely, and with what is believed to be more accuracy, set forth the real legal situation which exists on such occasions in the following language:

Now a State may have a right of intervention against another State for several grounds. * * * Thus, secondly, the right of protection over its citizens abroad which a State holds may cause an intervention by right, to which the other party is legally bound to submit. (Oppenheim, International Law, 1, p. 183.)

On this point there may be appropriately quoted also the language of the circuit court at Kansas, in Hamilton v. McClaughry ([1905] 136 Fed., 445), in which Pollock, district judge, said:

It has been well said the safety of the people is the supreme law of the land. The first duty of a State is the protection of the lives and property of its citizens, wherever lawfully situate, by peaceful means, if possible; if not, by force of arms. More especially must this protection be afforded the accredited representatives of this Government in a foreign country.

Further, citing the compilation to which earlier credit was given, I maintain with it and in the language used, to wit:

First. That the use of the forces of the United States in foreign countries to protect the lives and property of American citizens resident in that country does not constitute an act of war, and is therefore not equivalent to a declaration of war.

Second. The President, as the Chief Executive of the United States, charged with the responsibility of conducting our foreign intercourse, including the protection of the lives and property of our citizens abroad, has the authority to use the forces of the United States to secure such protection in foreign countries.

This second clause is subject, probably, to exceptions, depending on the facts surrounding the particular case; and while I am not ready to accept the doctrine to the full extent stated, yet I am sure that invasion of Mexico by our soldiers under order of the President at the time our citizens were killed and wounded at Douglas, Ariz., and El Paso, Tex., would not have been an act of war, and no declaration of war by Congress was necessary in order to justify or sanction the act.

Proper and prompt action by President Taft, using in the beginning all necessary force for the purpose, would have saved many lives and prevented the destruction of millions on millions of American property and would have averted the more serious trouble which, come it soon or come it late, seems now almost inevitable. American citizens can not longer be held for ransom within sight of their native soil. American labor must no more be driven with abuse and insult from its honest toil by regular soldiers or lawless brigands in Mexico. All factions should take notice that some means of subsistence other than American cattle grazing on lands owned by American citizens must be found. Our women shall no longer be driven by fear from place to place seeking protection from brigands masquerading in the guise of soldiers.

I know not what course others may take, but as for me, at all hazards and at any price, I demand protection for my countrymen and the enforcement of that demand against any offending nation under the sun.

I have a pride in the history that my country's deeds have written. I want those who come after me to read with unabated pride the further story of this Republic. Let us put no blot on that page by any act of injustice or oppression or dim its glory by submitting to either. Let it still be known that the man from Massachusetts shall be safe in Madagascar. Let it still be known that the American who walks in peace anywhere on all the globe has Old Glory waving over him. Justify to the minds of our boys and girls the Roman boast that to be a citizen of this Republic were better than a king.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Should Congress make provision for the printing of such report as a document, the American section of the commission requests that 500 copies thereof be made available for its use.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 27, 1913.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION, BRUNSWICK, GA.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98), authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Confederate veterans' reunion, to be held at Brunswick, Ga., in July, 1913, and I ask consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "ridges," to strike out "and," and in the same line, after the word "pins," to insert the words "and cots," so as to read: "with necessary poles, ridges, pins, and cots."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 103) appropriating $4,000 to defray traveling expenses of soldiers of the Civil War, now residing in the District of Columbia, from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

ASSIGNMENT OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. O'GORMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was recommitted the bill (S. 2254) to amend chapter 1, section 18, of the Judicial Code, I report it back favorably, with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary were, on page 1, line 5, before the word "senior," to strike out "any" and insert "the"; in line 6, before the word "circuit," to strike out "any" and insert "the second"; in line 7, before the word "circuit," to strike out "the" and insert "said"; in the same line, after the word "circuit," to strike out "in which the district lies"; in line 11, before the word "circuit," to strike out "the" and insert "said"; and in line 14, after the word "court," to insert "within the said second circuit"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 1, section 18, of the Judicial Code be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Whenever it shall be certified by the senior circuit judge of the second circuit, or, in his absence, by the circuit justice of said circuit, that on account of the accumulation or urgency of business in any district court in said circuit it is impracticable to designate and appoint a sufficient number of district judges of other districts within said circuit to relieve such accumulation or urgency of business, the Chief Justice may, if in his judgment the public interests so require, designate and appoint the judge of any district court in another circuit to hold a district court within the said second circuit, and to have and exercise within the district to which he is so assigned the same powers that are vested in the judge thereof: Provided, That such judge so designated and appointed shall have consented, in writing, to such designation and appointment: And provided further, That the senior circuit judge of the circuit within which such judge so designated and appointed resides shall certify, in writing, that the business of the district of such judge will not suffer thereby. Such appointment shall be filed in the clerk's office and entered on the minutes of the said district court, and a certified copy thereof, under the seal of the court, shall be transmitted by the clerk to the judge so designated and appointed. Each of the said district judges may, in the case of such appointment, hold separately, at the same time, a district court in such district, and discharge all of the judicial duties of the district judge therein."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS TO MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent that I may print some proclamations and other public documents in the few remarks I made this evening. I ask leave to insert nothing except extracts from historical documents that I should like to put in as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is given to the Senator from Arizona as requested.

COMMISSION ON VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, Calendar No. 38 is a proposed joint resolution unanimously reported by the Committee on Education and Labor. It provides for a commission of nine men, to be appointed by the President, to study the question of vocational education and report to us at the next session of Congress. It is important that it should be passed and go to the House at once to be concurred in. I think there will be no opposition at all to it. I ask unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I want to see what it is.

Mr. SMOOT. While the Senator from Mississippi is looking at the joint resolution, I should like to ask he Senator from Georgia if in reporting it the amendments were made that I suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the joint resolution had been reported unanimously before that time, but on the floor of the Senate I intend to ask to add one amendment, the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its present consideration, but I also want to offer one other amendment not suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 5) providing for the appointment of a commission to consider the need and report a plan for national aid to vocational education, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission consisting of nine men whose duty it shall be to consider the need and report a plan, not later than December 1 next, for national aid to vocational education.

SEC. 2. That the members of said commission shall be paid their actual traveling expenses and subsistence while engaged upon the work of said commission.

SEC. 3. That said commission shall have authority to employ a secretary and to make such investigations into local conditions of the respective States as they deem necessary, the entire expense of the commission not to exceed the sum of $25,000.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to meet the expenses of the said commission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to amend, after the figures "$25,000," in section 4, page 2, line 6, by inserting the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 2, line 6, after the sum "$25,000," it is proposed to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to meet the expenses of the said commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out "$25,000" in line 5, page 2, section 3, and also striking out "$25,000" in line 6, page 2, section 4, and inserting "$15,000" in both those places. The reason I suggest the amendment is this——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Georgia will accept the amendment, I will have nothing to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have never had charge of an investigation of this kind and do not know how much money is necessary for the purpose. I should regret to have the commission find that they did not have enough money for the work.

Mr. SMOOT. So would I.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If $15,000 will be plenty, I do not want another dollar for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will make the suggestion that I feel sure that $15,000 will be entirely adequate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some years ago I chanced to be chairman of a commission that made an investigation covering the entire country, and we spent only about $20,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Senators will observe that the resolution provides no compensation to anybody serving on the commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite positive that $10,000 is ample, but I am perfectly willing to make it $15,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 28, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 27, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, Father of all souls, that we can lay aside all political and religious differences and thus meet as brothers at the throne of grace, lifting up our hearts in unison to Thee for all the favors and blessings of the past, and with one accord seek Thy favor and Thy blessing upon the issues of this day, that they may be in accordance with Thy will. In the spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2517. An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees.

GETTYSBURG REUNION.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 103) appropriating $4,000 to defray traveling expenses of soldiers of the Civil War, now residing in the District of Columbia, from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return.

Resolved, etc., That to defray the traveling expenses of all honorably discharged soldiers of the Civil War and of all soldiers of the Confederate armies who rendered honorable service therein, now residing in the District of Columbia, from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return, to enable such soldiers to attend the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg, to be held at Gettysburg July 1, 2, 3, and 4, 1913, there is appropriated, one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

That such appropriation shall be expended by a commission consisting of the Secretary of War; Col. Thomas S. Hopkins, past commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac; and Capt. D. B. Mull, ex-commander of the United Confederate Veterans, of a post in Georgia, residents of the District of Columbia.

That said commission is authorized to adopt such rules for the determination of the persons entitled to transportation hereunder as they may deem proper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman who introduced this resolution whether he has consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to it?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Has he consented to this?

Mr. FOWLER. He has.

Mr. HOWARD. It is all right and it ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of workingmen's compensation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, among the grave and important subjects claiming the attention of this Congress perhaps there is no single one more important than that of workmen's compensation. The world-wide feeling that the burden of industrial accidents should be borne not by the unhappy sufferers alone but rather by the community at large has produced in recent years widespread legislative activity.

It will be remembered that in the year 1910 Congress passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 127, 61st Cong.), which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] had the honor of proposing, which created a commission to make an investigation of employers' liability and workmen's compensation. The commission so authorized reported to the Sixty-second Congress a bill which, on the 6th day of May, 1912, under the title of Senate bill 5382, passed the Senate of the United States, with amendments, by a vote of 64 yeas to 15 nays, and on the 1st day of March, 1913, with further amendments, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 218 yeas to 81 nays. The session, however, was so near its end that, notwithstanding the overwhelming majority in its favor, it was impossible to get the bill once more through the Senate or into conference, and thus the Sixty-second Congress expired without final action on this most urgent question.

On the first day of the present session I introduced in the House the bill as prepared by this commission, with certain amendments, and it is now before the House as H. R. 21. On the 15th of April, 1913, the Hon. GEORGE SUTHERLAND, Senator from the State of Utah and chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Commission, introduced the bill, with certain amendments, in the Senate of the United States, where it is now pending as S. 959. Between the bill as so introduced by myself and the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] there are certain differences of detail; and in order that the point of departure of the two Houses in the consideration of the subject might be the same, I have to-day reintroduced the bill in the House in the same form in which it has been introduced in the Senate and it is now before the House as H. R. 6534.

I do not desire at this time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss either the details of this bill or the subject at large, but hope to do so at a later date. Under the leave given me to extend my remarks, I now desire to insert in the RECORD a letter which has been addressed by Mr. H. E. Wills, assistant grand chief engineer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and acting national legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, to the members of the railroad organizations. This letter, in addition to its comments on the bill, contains certain statistical information which should be of interest to Members of the House in the consideration of this great and important subject. The letter is as follows:

ILLUSTRATING THE BENEFITS PAYABLE UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL, S. 959, NOW PENDING.

"In closing the discussion of the workmen's compensation bill in my report on national legislation issued April 5, 1913, I said:

"'The history of S. 5382 is now at an end; but the workmen's compensation bill is by no means dead. It will be reintroduced and given a new number by the extra session of the Sixty-third Congress. It is our intention to make some changes in phraseology to correct certain errors made in adding amendments and to cover any possible loopholes that may be discovered and to further liberalize it as to the amounts payable.'

"In fulfillment of this prediction there was introduced in the Senate on April 15 a bill (S. 959) by Senator SUTHERLAND, which, as he explained at the time, is the old commission compensation bill, which was improved by the amendments of the Sixty-second Congress, changed as indicated by the following quotation from his remarks:

"'In the preparation of this draft of the bill I have adopted most of the House amendments. Some of them I have not adopted. The principal amendment which I have not adopted is that which provides for a 5 days' waiting period instead of a 14 days' waiting period, as provided in the Senate bill. I have restored the Senate provision in that respect. The House amended the bill so as to provide for a maximum salary upon which the computation of compensation was to be made of $120 per month. In the bill that I have introduced I have taken off the maximum altogether, simply providing for a minimum salary upon which the computation of half wages is to be made of $50 a month, so that the minimum compensation under this bill, if passed, will be $25 a month, and there will be no maximum whatever. I have thought best to do that, because I think if we restore the provision with reference to the waiting period to 14 calendar days instead of 5 calendar days, the aggregate of the amount which will be saved by doing that will justify us in taking off the maximum. The 9 days which will be saved, applied to all of these employees, will amount in the aggregate to a considerable sum, while it will amount to a very trifling sum to each individual. The policy of this sort of legislation is primarily to take care of the serious accidents, the calamities; and by cutting out these trivial injuries we will save a large sum of money to apply to the more serious injuries.'

"The paramount features of a compensation law are the form, the scope, the administration, and the benefits. A careful comparison shows conclusively that in these four essentials the compensation bill indorsed and advocated by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, known as S. 5382, was the best that had up to that time been put forth with serious hopes of its becoming a law. And as carefully gone over and reintroduced, this bill is a decided improvement over any compensation law in force in the world, and is more liberal and effective in its essentials than any of the numerous measures now pending before Congress.

"Our bill in form is both exclusive and compulsory, as was that proposed by the Federal commission, which passed the Senate by a vote of 64 to 15, and which was then indorsed almost unanimously by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' convention at Harrisburg, and later, under our inducement, liberalized and passed by the House of Representatives on a vote of 218 to 81. It is in the form desired by all consistent advocates of the compensation system, and in the form most vigorously opposed by the damage-suit lawyers. It is in the form which, according to the highest opinion, is the one most likely to be held constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is in the form under which Congress assumes complete jurisdiction over the subject matter. It is in the form adopted by those States not under the necessity of providing putative optional or elective provisions in order to circumvent constitutional inhibitions. It is in the form under which in all reason the highest rates of awards can be secured.

"In defining its scope our bill uses the words 'arising out of and in the course of his employment'; and this scope is limited only by the section which provides 'that no compensation or benefits shall be allowed for the injury or death of any employee where it is proved that his injury or death was caused by his wilful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or that the same resulted from his intoxication while on duty: Provided, That this clause as to intoxication shall not apply if the employer knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the employee was intoxicated or that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated.' In England, in most of the Provinces of Canada, and in many of our States which have thus far enacted compensation laws, the same words, 'arising out of and in the course of his employment,' are adopted. Among the States which have so enacted are Illinois, Kansas, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, and Missouri, while California and Wisconsin vary it slightly by the use of the expression 'while engaged in the line of his duty or the course of his employment.' No foreign country has as narrow an exception provision as our bill. They usually provide that 'serious or willful misconduct' shall exempt an employee from recovering the benefits of the law. And few, if any, of the States have, when considered in its entirety, allowed such a broad scope of recovery as does S. 959. To be held constitutional our bill must provide a reasonable regulation of commerce, and can only include in its scope that subject matter which comes under the jurisdiction of Congress. I think no one who gives the matter thought would expect a law making the railroads absolute insurers of the safety of their employees, whether on or off duty. In using the words 'arising out of and in the course of his employment' we maintain a desired uniformity and have the advantage of precedents already established, and so prevent undue litigation.

"From the day of the publication of the very first tentative draft of the commission workmen's compensation bill until the present time there has been a repeated request for constructive suggestions as to how we can improve its administrative features, and since to date none of the very few recommendations for changes which have been received could consistently be adopted, I am safe in saying that the method of administration proposed in our bill is the best applicable to the situation. I can think of no scheme which in practice would result in greater justice in the settlement of disputes under a compensation law than to permit the employer and the employee or his dependents to adjust their differences between themselves or to leave the matter in the hands of committees similar to our adjustment committees, or, failing by either or both of these methods, to lay the case before an impartial arm of the equity courts, an official appointed by the district judge of the jurisdiction and paid by the United States Government, who will act as a mediator, a conciliator, an adjuster of accident claims, and from whose findings appeal may be taken by the employee to a jury of his peers.

"The form, scope, and administrative features of a compensation bill are matters which can well be left to legislative experts, but when it comes to a consideration of the benefits every man feels free to take a hand. Dollars and cents is the universal language; we all understand it. It is but natural that we should take an active interest in determining what we will get out of a compensation law which is to take the place of our other remedies.

"It is no idle boast when I state that all in all our bill as it now stands would provide a better balanced, a more certain and exact, and a higher rate of awards for personal injuries or deaths than any law in operation in the United States, and it is incomparably more liberal than the compensation laws of other countries. It is not my desire to speak disparagingly of any law, either State or Federal, the passage of which has been secured under the pressure of labor's demands, and it could in no way be to my personal aggrandizement to attempt to deceptively manipulate the figures of our bill in order to set it off to advantage against those enactments already secured for the relief of injured employees; but solely for the purpose of putting the truth of the matter before our men, and in so doing to perform my duty as their representative instructed to keep them posted on matters of national legislation affecting their interest, I make these statements.

"I have before me a copy of practically every compensation law in force in the world. I have especially carefully compared our bill with the laws of the various States (and some 16 have already supplanted the obsolete, inequitable, and expensive method of recovery through negligence damage suits by the adoption of the modern, humane, and costless system of general and automatic compensation), and I find that it would be decidedly to our advantage to secure the enactment of S. 959. And I trust that our men, regardless of what others may do, will continue to uphold and actively support the officers of their organization in their determination to carry out the declared policy of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' convention and work for the passage of the most liberal workmen's compensation law procurable.

"In running over the various laws I note that not one of them has a higher minimum wage basis set than has our bill. In figuring the percentages under our bill $50 is considered the lowest wage, whereas some of the States drop materially lower, while Arizona and New Hampshire provide no minimum whatever. I find that all the State compensation laws have restrictions on the maximum amounts payable, whereas under our bill no limit whatever is put upon the amount that would be paid. It is worth noting that the usual maximum set for death payments by the State laws is just about the same as the average amount which would be paid under our bill. I think the highest amount recoverable for death under any State law is that provided by the California statute, namely, $5,000. Reference to the appended table will show that in a not extreme case $15,300 will be paid the dependents for the death of their supporter under S. 959. The Wisconsin law, which has been considerably cited as giving satisfaction, says the average annual earnings shall not be taken at more than $750 per year, which sum is to be paid for four years, making a highest possible total for death of slightly over $3,000.

"The relative values of our bill and the State laws, as suggested in these few comparisons, is practically the same for the other schedules. None of the State laws would allow such a recovery as might be paid under our bill for permanent total disability (say, the loss of both arms) to an engineer 25 years old whose earnings as calculated under the bill are $300 per month and who lives to be 55. He would receive $150 per month for 30 years, making a total of $54,000. The average maximum amount allowed for this class under the State laws is only about $5,000.

"Comparative figures are given as notes to the appended table which suggest the increase in compensation over that paid under the present excellent liability law which would accrue to the employees under the proposed law. But even these figures do not tell the complete story of the advantage of a compensation law. It is necessary that I point out in clear and emphatic language the most serious situation now confronting railroad employees who meet with accident or suffer death while pursuing their duties. Such as one first must carry his case into court under the employers' liability law, and there he must prove negligence or fault on the part of the company. If he is able to prove this, the injured employee stands a possible chance for recovery, but he is usually compelled to wait while his case is being fought through one, two, or three tiresome trials, taking years of time and causing endless suspense and inconvenience. Then, when he finally settles his case, he only gets about one-half the amount of damages allowed. The other half is consumed in attorney's fees and attendant legal expenses. In all those hundreds of cases where fault is shown to be due to the employee, there is no possible chance of recovery in a court even under the most favorable interpretation of the liability law; but under our proposed compensation law no question of negligence or contributory negligence can be raised. The question of negligence, together with the barbarous defenses of fellow-servant responsibility and assumption of risks, are entirely abrogated. Under the compensation law it would be necessary merely to prove the fact that he was injured in the service of an interstate railroad and establish the nature of the injury; then his award or damages or compensation is sure, immediate, and definite. There would be no delay, no awful suspense, no exorbitant expense, no friction with the company; and no chance is taken, no gamble is necessary. Our bill would pay for every case of injury according to earnings and dependency. In actual amounts more would be paid for the same class of disability in almost every instance than is received under the liability law; but in reckoning the benefits of our measure there should be added in each case the sum allowed for hospital, surgical, and doctor bills, whereas from each total under the liability law there should be subtracted the cost of settlements.

"It has been said that if there were really such a difference in the two laws the railroad companies would be actively opposing the pending bill. That statement, if made in good faith, is excusable; but in my opinion it was first put forth on an assumption that its hearers were either ignorant or unthinking. Those who are observant know that the most effective way to defeat legislation advocated by labor is to divide the labor unions, to bring about internal dissensions, or to pit one organization against another in a struggle for petty preference or prominence. I call attention to the present disunited condition of the four railroad employee organizations on the subject of workmen's compensation as evidence of the success of the efforts of the companies to defeat what is to them an undesirable piece of legislation without assuming the responsibility of so doing. The employees are affected alike by the bill. Consistency would expect us to express a similar desire in regard to its disposition. As it now is, however, our wants seem to be four. Our greatest advantage still lies in the one way, and that is the way first determined upon by the responsible officers of the organizations, and then adopted by the Grand International Division of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; it is in the passage of an exclusive and compulsory compensation law, one that is broad in its scope, equitable in its method of administration, and liberal in its amounts of compensation. And the bill that best measures up to this standard is S. 959, copy of which will be sent on request."

Statistics compiled by experts in the employ of the United States Government show that the average amount paid for injury resulting in death during a period of three years under the employers' liability law was $1,221. The average under this table of 56 deaths is $3,610. Expenses of litigation should be deducted from the $1,221; whereas the entire $3,610 is paid the dependents. In 1912 there were 3,320 employees killed while on duty in train operation and from industrial accidents, so called, whose dependents would be provided for under this bill.

Where permanent total disability results from any injury there shall be paid to the injured employee 50 per cent of the monthly wages of such employee during the remainder of his life.

(4) Where temporary partial disability results from an injury, the employee, if he is unable to secure work at the same or better wages than he was receiving at the time of the injury, shall receive 50 per cent of his wages during the continuance of such disability; but such payment shall not extend beyond the period fixed for payment for permanent partial disabilities of the same character; and if the employee refuses to work after suitable work is furnished or secured for him by the employer, at the same or better wages than he was receiving at the time of the injury, he shall not be entitled to any compensation for such disability during the continuance of such refusal.

In the above, as in other cases, the employer is required to furnish "all medical and surgical aid and assistance that may be reasonably required, including hospital services," during the 14 days and to continue the same after the 14 days in an amount not to exceed $200; and all this in addition to the awards allowed. The average for these classes under the liability law is $73 per case.

LOBBIES.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of lobbies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of lobbies. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask my colleague whether it is his intention to insert in the RECORD one of his entertaining newspaper articles published throughout the country, so that Congress may have the same information that he gives to others?

Mr. TAVENNER. No. I can inform the gentleman that I think this will be even more interesting than any of my newspaper articles, should I get the permission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, in the election last fall the people elected Members of Congress to revise the tariff on sugar and other necessaries downward as one step toward the reduction of the ever-increasing cost of living.

Powerful lobbies are now in Washington endeavoring to persuade these Members of Congress to break their pledges to the people and betray the consumers of the land, to the end that a few men, already rich beyond the dreams of avarice, may add to their swollen fortunes.

It was to place before the public this state of affairs that President Wilson made his now famous statement, in which, referring to these lobbies, he said:

> Washington has seldom seen so numerous, so industrious, or so insidious a lobby. There is every evidence that money without a limit is being spent to sustain this lobby and to create an appearance of a pressure of public opinion antagonistic to some of the chief items of the tariff bill.

In order that the public might know all of the facts about the condition alluded to by President Wilson, I introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives to investigate the subject.

RESOLUTION TO INVESTIGATE LOBBIES.

This resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas it has been charged by the President of the United States and there is reason to believe that a powerful and insidious lobby, representing interests hostile to the passage of the pending tariff bill in the form adopted by the House of Representatives, is in existence in Washington; and
> Whereas newspapers are being filled with paid advertisements calculated to create an artificial public opinion against certain items of the tariff bill; and
> Whereas it is charged and there is reason to believe that unlimited funds have been placed at the disposal of this lobby for the purpose of overcoming the interests of the public for the private profit of the interests which they represent; and
> Whereas the public maintains no lobby and is powerless to reply to the paid advertisements of any lobby representing financial interests; and
> Whereas bills are pending in Congress to regulate and control the operation of lobbies at the National Capitol, and it is advisable to gather any and all facts bearing on the aforesaid conditions and charges or in any way relating thereto as a basis for remedial purposes: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That a special committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess of Congress for the purpose of investigating and reporting to Congress the facts in connection with the operation of any lobby or lobbies in Washington; said committee shall inquire into the sources whence any such lobby or lobbies are supplied with funds and the amount of funds so contributed; and shall also ascertain where and how these funds are expended and for what immediate and ultimate purpose; and shall go into a general inquiry to learn the methods by which any lobby seeks to influence legislation in Congress.

PEOPLE WANT CAMPAIGN PROMISES KEPT.

If Members of Congress were to allow themselves to be guided by the views of the lobbyists, they would conclude that the people back home were not in good faith when they voted for tariff revision downward. Or, if they were in good faith at the time, that they have since changed their minds, deciding they do not desire the monopolies of the tariff trusts interfered with.

But President Wilson is not being fooled. Nor is the average Member of Congress. They know that for every man who beseeches them in Washington to retain the tariff on sugar there are nine hundred and ninety-nine of their constituents who are not writing letters, but who demand that promises made to them before election be kept after election, and especially the downward revision of the tariff on the vital necessaries of life, such as sugar.

President Wilson and the Members of Congress also know that every penny of the extra dividends that the lobby interests will make by virtue of legislation granting them special privileges must come from the pockets of the men, women, and children in the districts back home.

It will be recalled that President Taft once faced the same crisis that Members of Congress face now. He listened to the voices at his ear in Washington, whom the late Senator Dolliver described as "men who knew exactly what they wanted." President Taft forgot the folks at home who do not write letters, but who desired tariff revision downward, and on the very first election day following they got revenge. The lobbyists in Washington whose counsel he had accepted were powerless to save him from the wrath of the home folks who vote, but who maintain no lobbies in Washington.

LOBBIES DEFEATED GROVER CLEVELAND.

"The trusts and combinations—the communism of pelf—whose machinations have prevented us from reaching the success we deserved, should not be forgotten nor forgiven."

These are the words of Grover Cleveland. He was referring to the tariff lobbies which prevented the Democratic Party from living up to its campaign promises of 1892.

President Wilson no doubt has in mind what the lobbyists did to the Wilson Democratic tariff bill in the Senate in 1894 when he denounces the lobbies operating in Washington.

A review of what happened to the last Democratic tariff bill as a result of the work of the lobbies while the measure was in the Senate is especially interesting at this time when special privilege is trying to perform the same old trick of robbing the consumers of the fruits of their victory at the polls.

CAMPAIGN PROMISES WERE FULFILLED IN HOUSE.

On December 19, 1893, Chairman Wilson, of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee, reported his tariff revision downward bill to the House of Representatives. It was a fulfillment in nearly every particular of the promises made by the Democrats in the campaign of 1892, which brought about their election. Although denounced by the more partisan Republicans as a free-trade measure, it was in reality but a conservative step in the direction of freer trade, and was well received by the Democratic Party throughout the country. It made rather moderate reductions in the duties on woolen goods, cottons, linens, silks, pig iron, steel billets, steel rails, china, glassware, and earthenware. It removed entirely the taxes on wool, coal, iron ore, lumber, and on sugar both raw and refined.

The bill passed the House February 1, 1894, by a vote of 182 to 106, 61 Members not voting.

BUT LOBBIES GOT IN THEIR WORK IN THE SENATE.

But in the Senate special privilege attacked the bill ferociously, powerful lobbies being conducted day and night. Certain Democratic Senators, foremost among them Gorman, of Maryland, and Brice, of Ohio, forgot the solemn pledges of the Democratic convention of 1892 and rendered most efficient services to the protected interests.

The work of the lobbies had their effect. The special-interest servers in the Senate obtained one amendment after another, each one restoring a part of the remitted duties. In all, the Senate made 634 changes in the House measure, destroying entirely its original character. The people were cheated out of their victory at the polls. Special privilege had stepped in and, via the lobby route, had defeated the interests of the people. The bill was passed, but President Cleveland refused to sign it, allowing it to become a law without his signature.

President Grover Cleveland deserved credit for having endeavored in every good faith to see that preelection promises should be carried out. His whole soul was in the fight. His defeat at the hands of the lobbies carried the bitterest humiliation and disappointment. He was a changed man all the remaining years of his life. In a letter to Mr. Catchings, a Mississippi Congressman, he used the quotation alluded to. It should be easy for everyone to realize that President Wilson, in the courageous fight he is making against the lobbies in Washington, is simply trying to prevent special privilege from again depriving the American people of a well-earned victory.

THE MILK IN THE LOBBY-CONTROVERSY COCONUT.

If the sugar lobbyists should succeed in having the tariff restored to sugar, the Sugar Trust and the men back of the sugar lobbies would each year draw down dividends amounting to millions of dollars.

But where would this money come from? The answer to this question is the milk in the lobby-controversy coconut. The millions that would go annually to the sugar magnates would not drop from the blue sky, but would come from the consumers—the men, women, and children of the United States who use sugar.

The lobby issue is plain. If the lobbyists win out in their fight to persuade Members of Congress to forget their promises to the people and slap the tax back on sugar, the consumers must go on contributing to the coffers of the Sugar Trust by paying artificially high prices for sugar. And if the sugar lobbyists do not succeed, these millions will be saved to American consumers.

Thus it will be seen that the consumers have something at stake in the framing of a tariff bill as well as the sugar barons.

SOME WHO WOULD BE BENEFITED BY SUGAR LOBBYISTS.

If the sugar lobbyists should succeed, one of the principal beneficiaries would be the same old Sugar Trust which not so very long ago stole some $2,000,000 from the Government in customs duties by deliberately placing steel springs in 14 pairs of scales, so that their importation of sugar would be underweighed and the Government cheated. Caught red-handed, the trust was forced to disgorge most of the plunder, and a few underlings were sent to jail and released after serving a small portion of their sentence. But none of the millionaire sugar magnates into whose pockets the stolen millions would have gone had the crime been undiscovered were even called to the bar of justice, let alone prosecuted.

Conducting a lobby in Washington by the sugar interests is a business proposition strictly. The multimillionaire sugar magnates, who are every year adding to their colossal fortunes by millions through the kindness of Uncle Sam in giving them a protective tariff which guarantees them a monopoly of American markets with power to charge consumers what they please for sugar, can well afford to spend a few hundreds of thousands in the form of $1,000-a-month salaries to slick-tongued lobbyists, if by doing so they can prevent their monopolies and profits from being interfered with.

To hear the wail now going up from the $1,000-a-month men one would imagine Congress had not given the sugar people any opportunity whatever to be heard. The fact is a committee of 21 Members of the House of Representatives—the Ways and Means Committee—sat in session for weeks, listening to the arguments of those desiring protection. The sugar people were permitted to say any and every thing they desired. The members of the Ways and Means Committee sat somewhat as a court. They considered all the testimony, and then brought in their verdict in the form of the Underwood bill. After having had a fair deal in open court the Sugar Trust is now trying to win, as usual, by the underhand method of approaching Members of Congress in private or working in the dark.

The people are at a disadvantage in the face of this kind of warfare, because they have no knowledge of the pressure and kind of arguments brought to bear on Congressmen by special privilege. There are no lobbyists to present the viewpoint of the consumers or to disprove the false statements which may be poured into the Congressmen's ears by the able and resourceful representatives of the Sugar Trust.

NATURALLY THE PEOPLE ARE AVERSE TO LOBBYING.

If a man living in California had a lawsuit before a judge in far-away New York, and knew that his rival in the litigation was in the habit of dining with the court and spending an hour or two daily in private conversation with him "in chambers," he would, if he was an average human being, be inclined to be a little nervous over the situation. And that is about the way it is with the consumers of the United States. They are just a little bit nervous over the fact that special privilege is paying men $1,000 a month to persuade their representatives to vote for the interests of the tariff trusts instead of the interests of the consumers.

SENATOR THOMAS ON FIRING LINE FOR CONSUMERS.

By his recent speech in the Senate exposing the methods used by the Beet Sugar Trust to manufacture false and artificial public sentiment against the tariff bill, Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, has performed a public service second only to that of the President in calling attention to the insidious tariff lobby, the most powerful which ever operated in Washington.

Senator THOMAS's speech gives the public some idea of the pressure national legislators must withstand when they attempt to pass laws which the special interests oppose but which the people want.

Senator THOMAS and his colleague, Senator SHAFROTH, as well as two Representatives at large, EDWARD KEATING and E. T. TAYLOR, were elected in Colorado last fall on the Democratic ticket by pluralities ranging from 45,000 to 50,000 votes. While the platform did not specifically indorse the removal of the duty on sugar, it indorsed all the actions of the last Democratic House, one of which was to pass a free-sugar bill, and Representative KEATING ran on a straight free-sugar platform. It appears evident that Colorado, with its extensive sugar industry, voted for free sugar by a plurality of 45,000.

The special session of Congress met. The tariff bill, providing for free sugar, was introduced. And then what happened? From all parts of Colorado letters began pouring in on that State's Senators and Representatives protesting against free sugar. So numerous and vehement were these letters and telegrams that they apparently indicated a tremendous revulsion of feeling in the State toward the sugar tariff. Any honest legislator might well hesitate before he voted against such an overwhelming expression of public opinion.

HOW EMPLOYEES COME TO PROTEST AGAINST FREE SUGAR.

Senator THOMAS, however, went behind the returns. He got in communication with Thomas S. Price, an intelligent man formerly employed by the Great Western Sugar Co., at Longmont, Colo., who told the Senator how the fictitious public sentiment was manufactured. He wrote:

> You will no doubt receive letters from employees of the factory here, as they are compelled in an underhanded way either to write them or take chances of losing their jobs by refusing.

Price inclosed a form letter which the sugar companies ordered their employees to copy, sign, and mail to Washington. This letter does not speak for the sugar company but is all for the poor farmer and the poor wage earner. After instructing the employees how to direct the letters, the instructions were:

> A letter to Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, Washington, D. C., will do a lot of good. If you are a Democrat, tell them so; it will carry more weight.

In this way thousands of employees of Colorado sugar mills have been "influenced" to write to their Senators and Congressmen, urging them to vote against free sugar. Senator THOMAS charged that a similar campaign was carried on among the sugar-beet growers and with banks and commercial associations, all of whom have been adding their letters to the flood now pouring in upon the Colorado legislators.

HOW SENATOR THOMAS VIEWS THE MATTER.

> These companies have made an enormous amount of money, not only upon their capitalization, but upon their overcapitalization—

Declared Senator THOMAS—

> Two of them operating in Colorado represent collectively a capital of $50,000,000, $30,000,000 of which is water pure and simple. Yet they have paid dividends constantly upon their preferred stock, and for a large part of the time on their watered stock, and one of them has a surplus in the treasury in excess of $10,000,000.
> This fight merely means that these hugely overcapitalized industries want to retain their franchise to rob the people by taxing the necessaries of life, to the end that they may pay profits upon the capital that they have invested and upon the capital they have manufactured with printing presses and fountain pens.

Senator THOMAS's ringing challenge to the sort of public opinion these bloated corporations have manufactured deserves to be read in the public schools as an example of the new, rugged patriotism which now has control of Congress. He said:

> Mr. President, while I have the most profound respect for petitions sent to myself while I am a Member of the Senate, I want to say here and now, and I think I speak for my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] as well as myself, that I was sent here by the people of my State, by the producers and by the consumers, by men and women who are not organized, who have no lobby, who are possessed with no great fund to go out through the highways and byways of the State seeking and obtaining favorable action in their behalf by the great banks and associations.
> They are the toilers and the taxpayers, "the common people," as Mr. Lincoln called them. It is their interest and their welfare, their wants and their desires that I propose to represent and promote in the Senate of the United States to the best of my ability. They look to us for relief, and we shall not disappoint them.

ANOTHER PHASE OF SUGAR LOBBY QUESTION.

A land of oppression, misery, and sorrow, that is the picture drawn of the Hawaiian sugar plantations by testimony brought out by the Senate lobby investigation.

The very crowd of men whose legislative activities in Washington brought forth the recent lobby accusation from President Wilson are the representatives of rich planters whose cruel exploitation of their wage slaves has no counterpart under the Stars and Stripes.

These sugar growers, earning profits of 50 to 90 per cent, and asking for the continuance of a tax of over $100,000,000 annually on the American people, that they may continue to reap their golden rewards, are coming before Congress in the name of "protection against the pauper labor of Europe," all the while they maintain a labor standard that is a blot on American civilization.

So terrible are working conditions in Hawaii that European and Asiatic laborers, deceived into coming to the island, literally starve themselves in order to save up passage money for San Francisco, and escape the trap into which they have been inveigled. A horde of these pauper laborers are beginning to arrive in California, in their extremity willing to work for any price, thus depressing wages of Americans on the Pacific coast.

Incidentally, Senator REED, of Missouri, a member of the lobby committee, showed that a report exposing this condition was written by Daniel F. Keefe, Commissioner of Immigration, who went to Hawaii at the request of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to study the industrial conditions. The report, however, was never published. It was suppressed by the Taft administration. The Bureau of Labor sent a man to Hawaii to get out another report on labor conditions. This report flattered the planters and was published.

The Government investigator who wrote the whitewashing report was shortly thereafter given a good job with the Hawaiian Territorial government, while Secretary Nagel later busied himself preparing charges looking to the removal of Keefe.

HAWAIIAN SUGAR-MILL LABORERS LITTLE BETTER OFF THAN SLAVES.

Senator REED, however, resurrected the suppressed report and brought it before the lobby committee. The planters have been proudly proclaiming the fact that no peonage exists in Hawaii. After reading the report I am convinced it would be better for the wretched plantation and sugar-mill laborers if they were peons or actual slaves. They would be better treated by their owners.

Wages run from $8 per month for children up to $26 for white adult men. Hours are 10 and 12 a day. The employees live in miserable shacks provided by the companies. The men buy food from company stores, where prices range from 10 to 70 per cent higher than average food prices in New York, Washington, Chicago, and San Francisco. The food is sold to the plantation stores by Honolulu wholesale houses, owned for the most part by the plantation owners.

Doctors employed by the companies have gone to visit sick laborers 24 to 48 hours after being called, sometimes only to find corpses instead of patients. Laborers are called insulting names and treated like dogs by field bosses. "In a desperate effort to keep down the wage rate of all employees" the planters are spending huge sums importing Filipinos for laborers. These workmen are the dregs of the Philippine population, gathered from jails and almshouses, the very young and the very old, weak, and racked with disease.

The imported laborer, arriving penniless, is held in actual subjugation, unable to escape from the island, which is possible only to the hardier individuals, who can endure starvation while saving passage money. But the rich owners have devised a crafty "homestead" system, whereby in exchange for an acre of land received after six years' occupancy the homesteader virtually binds himself to labor for life on the plantation.

WHY THE INSISTENCE FOR FREE SUGAR?

Why free sugar? Why has all of the bitterness of the tariff battle settled upon this single commodity, which is one of the cheapest of all foods and which at casual glance does not seem to rank high among the important food products?

The Louisiana cane-sugar producers claim that free sugar will wipe out their industry. The beet-sugar producers of the United States have an investment of about $61,000,000, according to the report of the Hardwick committee, which investigated the American sugar industry last year. The beet interests are claiming irreparable damage to be caused by free sugar. The Hawaiians, the Porto Ricans, the domestic beet-sugar producers, and the Louisiana interests are maintaining in Washington the tariff lobby against whose insidious activities President Woodrow Wilson so justly complains. These lobbyists contend that free sugar means ruin for the American sugar industry. And yet the administration is not halted. Why?

There is a basic principle underlying the Democratic determination to remove the tax from sugar. The ordinary man does not understand the question at all clearly. The sugar question has seldom been plainly stated to the average citizen. Yet when the conditions under which sugar is now produced are clearly understood, the free-sugar principle becomes as simple as it is just. It then becomes astonishing that this country ever taxed sugar. To protect this product is the very opposite of common business judgment.

I shall therefore endeavor to explain the free-sugar argument as I see it and the effect free sugar may be expected to have on the different phases of the industry in this country. In the first place, what of the importance of sugar as food?

In a recent bulletin issued by the Department of Agriculture sugar is given a place among the three or four most important foodstuffs, following after meat and bread. In the human diet it is the great energy producer. And so it is the great food of the workingman. Experiments have shown that while large quantities of sugar give dyspepsia to idlers and indoor workers it is readily digested by men who do manual work, supplying them with stores of physical energy.

Sugar as we know it, however, is a commodity of the last century. It was formerly produced only in India, and Europeans supposed it to be a gum which exuded from trees. Cultivation of sugar cane began in this country in 1751, but only in the last 75 years has it come into general use. The world production is now over 16,000,000 tons, of which over 4,000,000 tons, or 81 pounds per capita, are consumed annually in the United States.

In the latter part of the eighteenth century a German chemist discovered that sugar could be made from beets. This was merely a scientific curiosity until Napoleon, realizing the absurdity of fighting England's army while France was paying great annual sums to British sugar producers, which money England was using to equip new armies and navies, by imperial edict established a large number of sugar mills in France and ordered the French peasants to produce all the sugar consumed in the country.

This was the beginning of the beet-sugar industry, which has thrived until now the beet-sugar production of the world nearly equals that from cane. Sugar-beet growing began in the United States in the late nineties.

PEOPLE TAXED ANNUALLY IN EXCESS OF TOTAL SUGAR INVESTMENT.

Compare the total investment in the American sugar industry with the amount the duty on sugar costs the American people annually and we pick up the clue explaining why, despite the presence of the sugar lobbies in Washington, the 2-cent tariff tax was removed from sugar.

Exclusive of land and farm animals, which can be used in other farming operations, the total investment in sugar in the United States is about $100,000,000. For the benefit of the few men owning this industry the American people are taxed annually in the increased price of sugar $140,000,000, or $40,000,000 more than the total sugar investment. It is also $40,000,000 more than the total annual value of the American sugar crop, including its by-products.

To the individual this tax amounts to $1.50, or an annual charge of $7.50 on a family of average size.

Since 1897 the protection to the sugar industry has cost American consumers $2,000,000,000. But if the public got value received for this sum—in revenue to defray the cost of government—there would not be so much complaint. But the actual duty collected in 16 years has been only $800,000,000. The balance, $1,200,000,000, has been a bonus, pure and simple, wrung from the poor to create a new group of American millionaires.

CANE-SUGAR INDUSTRY IS LARGELY ARTIFICIAL.

Leaving aside the principle that sugar as a prime food necessity should come untaxed to the American public, the production of cane sugar in this country is an artificial, unnatural industry.

There are two types of sugar production—from sugar beets, grown in many sections of the country, and from sugar cane, grown along the Gulf coast of Louisiana and Texas. It is possible, indeed probable, that beet-sugar production has now progressed to a point where it can be called a natural industry. If so, it does not need protection in order to survive. But there is no natural justification for cane-sugar production in the United States.

It is possible to grow bananas and tea in New England in hothouses. Yet not even the most rabid protectionist would advocate a prohibitive duty on bananas or tea, raising the prices of these foods ten times above what they are now, in order that tea and bananas might be produced with profit in hothouses in New England.

In a somewhat smaller degree cane-sugar growing is a hothouse industry. The sugar in cane is called sucrose by chemists. Louisiana cane is only 6 to 7 per cent sucrose, while Cuban cane is 11 to 14 per cent and Hawaiian from 14 to 15 per cent sucrose, or over twice as much sugar in the same amount of cane.

In Cuba sugar cane grows naturally, and is planted once every 10 years. In Louisiana the cane must be replanted every year. There is never frost in Cuba; in Louisiana the cane must be cut in October before maturity to escape frost, thus accounting for the lower sucrose content. Louisiana sugar mills are antiquated, while some of the Cuban factories are the latest and most efficient in the world.

And so, though Louisiana wages are lower than those paid in Cuba, it costs nearly 4 cents to produce a pound of raw sugar in Louisiana against a Cuban cost of 2 cents. Said Representative T. W. HARDWICK, of Georgia, the great sugar expert of the House:

> In order to produce a cane-sugar crop valued at $25,000,000, our Louisiana friends insist that we ought to continue a system of taxation that costs the American people $140,000,000 in the increased price of sugar. It is undemocratic, it is unfair, it is unrighteous, and, so far as I am concerned, I will never stand for a continuance of this policy to keep a duty on this great necessity of life which can not possibly be produced in Louisiana one-half as cheaply as it can in the balance of the world.

AND NOW AS TO THE BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Why not continue the tariff tax on sugar in order to protect the sugar-beet industry?

This is the query raised by the sugar lobbies. Here is the answer: It is unfair to require 90,000,000 sugar consumers to pay 2 cents a pound more for sugar than it is worth in order to protect the sugar-beet industry, because, although the sugar-beet factories are overcapitalized approximately $80,000,000, or 57 per cent, they are paying large dividends and making millions in profits.

The greatest lobby ever known in Washington is now being financed by the beet-sugar manufacturers. Money is being spent like water, and the Senate investigation has shown a scandalous misuse of publicity and the postal franks of certain special-privilege Senators. If money can do it, this lobby will defeat free sugar, not because the industry faces ruin, but because the sugar barons wish to continue to pay enormous dividends in the worst watered industry in the United States. The high sugar duties of the successive Dingley and Payne tariffs have made possible an overcapitalization in this industry without parallel in American financial history.

The total capitalization of all the beet-sugar companies is $141,000,000. The industry is peculiar in that it is possible to estimate very closely the actual cost of building factories. It has been worked out that it costs to build a factory $1,000 for each ton of beets to be consumed by the factory per day. Thus a mill with 100 tons of beet capacity per day costs $100,000.

Now the total daily capacity of all the beet-sugar factories in America is 63,550 tons, showing that the total actual investment is not over $63,550,000. Indeed, the Hardwick sugar committee estimated the actual investment at $60,712,000.

EIGHTY MILLIONS OF DOLLARS OF WATER.

Thus, of the beet-sugar capitalization, from seventy-eight to eighty millions of dollars is pure water, or 57 per cent. J. Pierpont Morgan in his prime never poured water into stocks at this rate. Even the Steel Trust achievement could not equal it.

Some of the individual companies exceed even this figure. The Great Western Sugar Co., capitalized at $30,000,000, is worth $10,600,000. The American Beet Sugar Co., with $20,000,000 capitalization, represents an investment of $5,300,000. The plants of the Michigan Sugar Co., which issued over $11,000,000 capital stock, can be duplicated for $5,450,000.

But in spite of these fictitious valuations, the sugar companies have been able to pay high dividends on all their capital stock. The sugar investigation showed that the Great Western Sugar Co., besides paying 7 per cent dividends on its preferred stock and 5 per cent on common, amassed a surplus of $9,000,000 in five years, making an annual net profit on actual investment of 36 per cent, or 182 per cent in five years. This company actually had to juggle its figures to keep down dividends on stock over half of which was water.

The American Beet Sugar Co. made $9,600,000 on an actual investment of $5,300,000 in seven years. The Michigan Sugar Co. paid back in four years every dollar of real money invested in it.

The great crime of modern finance is overcapitalization. A charter granted to a watered concern is simply a charter to rob the poor and the helpless, for obviously either prices must be raised to an unnatural level or wages must be reduced in order that dividends may be paid on money that is not invested. The beet-sugar industry is one of the worst of offenders, yet its great lobby is demanding that the working people of this country shall be taxed $1.50 per year in order that they may continue to pay dividends on watered stock.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 32, Calendar No. 3 on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama calls up a bill which the Clerk will report. The gentleman from Alabama will please send up the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it was turned in at the Clerk's desk yesterday.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman asks unanimous consent. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not hear what the gentleman said, and I ask that he repeat it.

Mr. MANN. I understood that the gentleman asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 32.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I shall object in the end to the immediate consideration of that bill this morning, so I doubt whether it is necessary to read the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the matter is presented in rather an unusual way, but not without a precedent. May I give a history of the matter? The bill which passed the House relates to this additional judge in the district in which the city of Philadelphia is located.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I supposed he was talking about another bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not now.

The SPEAKER. Anyway the gentleman ought to get some action on this conciliation bill which has just come over.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said it was a bill reported in yesterday, and I supposed it was the conciliation bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. There was so much confusion——

Mr. MANN. Yes. The gentleman gave the number of the bill correctly, but I thought it was the other bill. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama and all concerned to the fact that the Senate has just sent over a message transmitting this conciliation bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not called up the mediation bill, as both the Speaker and I supposed, but is calling up the bill for the additional judge in Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was about to tell what it is, and once for all now, if I may be permitted, I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLAYTON. Some time ago this House passed a bill providing for the appointment of an additional judge to preside over the United States court in the district in which the city of Philadelphia is located. That bill was considered in the House here, and passed with an amendment which is known as the Cullop amendment, requiring publication of the indorsements of the appointee.

Mr. PALMER. Known also as the Mann amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say an amendment hereafter to be known as the Mann amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was correct the first time. It is the Cullop amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. "The gentleman from Indiana" accepts the distinction and is proud of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentlemen may quarrel about that distinction among themselves. That is not pertinent to this inquiry. We will call the baby either Mann or Cullop. It will be just as pretty it matters not which, because they are both specimens of personal pulchritude. [Laughter.] I myself do not know which one is the more beautiful. That would be an æsthetic question, and perhaps the ladies can determine that when suffrage is universal.

This bill passed with that amendment and went to the Senate. The Senate struck out that part of the bill which we have designated as the Cullop or Mann amendment, and also amended the bill in the further particular by putting on another section providing for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the fourth circuit, in which circuit the States of West Virginia, Virginia, South Carolina, and others lie.

With those two amendments the bill passed the Senate and came here.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has made several efforts to secure a disagreement to the Senate amendments and to ask for a conference, but has not been successful. The bill is now reported back here with a resolution providing for the appointment of a conference committee. I find a precedent for that in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, page 649, section 6271, and that seemed to me to be the only way to get the matter up, having failed to get it up in the other way which I have attempted heretofore, which is well known to the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution which the committee reported, which is at the Clerk's desk, to disagree to both the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and send the bill to conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill has been reported to the House and I suppose has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, although it appears by the calendar that it was referred to the House Calendar. It should have been referred to the Union Calendar, because it is a bill requiring consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; but if it has not been referred to the Union Calendar I suppose it would not require unanimous consent to discharge the committee. I think we had better have the Senate amendments reported before the request is put.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Are the original papers at the desk?

Mr. CLAYTON. They were turned into the Clerk's desk yesterday.

Mr. MANN. The House can not act unless they are actually at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the following: "Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

Add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit, who shall receive the same salary as other circuit judges now receive, and shall reside within the said fourth circuit: Provided, That the office of circuit judge to which Robert W. Archbald was originally appointed is hereby abolished and no successor shall be appointed to fill said office."

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Alabama will make a request for the immediate consideration of the Senate amendments, I shall not object.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am told that perhaps others will object on this side.

Mr. MANN. I can not help that; I have no control over them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me to give an entire answer to his question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to say that the only object of the request I have preferred to-day is to get the disagreement to the Senate amendments and get the matter into conference. Then the whole matter will come up for discussion and further consideration on the report of the conferees. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will let it go through in that shape. There will be ample opportunity to discuss the Cullop and the Mann amendment and vote on it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama knows, and there is no use to beat around the bush, that the conference report is acted upon as a whole, and that there is no opportunity to have a separate vote on any amendment when it is presented. The gentleman can not mislead me on that subject, nor does he intend to. If the gentleman desires immediate consideration of the Senate amendments I have no objection. But I shall demand a separate vote on the amendments.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think the gentleman is entirely correct. I think the conference report would be the subject of debate.

Mr. MANN. Subject of debate, certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. And discussion; and that would bring up the whole question as to this Cullop or Mann amendment as well as the judgeship and whether we should agree to the conference report. That would be the very question presented to the House by the conference report, and the whole matter would then be before the House for full consideration.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CLAYTON. With pleasure.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question regarding the conditions that now exist that did not exist when this bill passed the House. There has been a removal now of one of the judges of the Commerce Court, Mr. Archbald. He was from the State of Pennsylvania, and a resolution has already passed the caucus of the majority in this House to abolish the Commerce Court. Now, what is there to prevent the President filling that vacancy and designating that judge to hold court in Philadelphia until the disability of the present judge is removed? It seems to me that there is no necessity of this bill at all under the conditions as they exist at this time. It is creating a bad precedent in the appointment of judges who are to sit in place of some other judge without creating either a new circuit or a new court. That is the condition that exists now, and it begins to look like this was done more to give some one a berth than to relieve an existing necessity. I ask the gentleman from Alabama who has charge of this matter if the whole matter can not be remedied in the manner I have pointed out?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think that the situation in the city of Philadelphia that this bill sought to remove when it was introduced in the House and passed can be removed in the way the gentleman suggests, but the conference committee could take care of one branch of his suggestion, and that is in regard to creating another circuit or creating another judgeship for the fourth circuit, as the Senate sought to do by the amendment which it put upon it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the fourth circuit judgeship involved in this proposition now?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; that is one of the Senate amendments to which I want to disagree.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman wants to disagree to that?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am in hearty sympathy with the gentleman's motion in that respect.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to disagree to the other amendments, also.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand the gentleman to mean that as a conferee he is going to resist that amendment?

Mr. CLAYTON. The conferee is going to do the best he can.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is his position on the conference?

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman think that is a proper question? If he does, I will answer it, and I will submit it to him. Does the gentleman think that a conferee ought to tell his attitude before he goes into the conference? If the gentleman does, then I will say that I have no concealments to make; but, as a matter of good form, does the gentleman think it is a proper thing?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not insist upon that; but I will ask the gentleman this: Will the gentleman agree, as one of the conferees, that before there is any action on the conference report the House shall be given a separate vote on that question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could deprive the House of the opportunity if it wanted it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes. We have to vote on a conference report as a whole.

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say that I said to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in the beginning of my remarks that the House would have an opportunity to consider it. I shall certainly favor the House voting separately on these propositions, and I do not want to say any more about my attitude; but there will be no disposition, and there never has been on my part, to preclude the House from expressing its candid judgment. I never have invoked technicalities.

Mr. HARDWICK. But one of the rules of the House is that a conference report is voted on as a whole.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I understand. I know it is not severable ordinarily, but I know that if it is requested ordinarily it is severed, and there is a division had if requested, and I can assure the gentleman if the committee on conference does not ask a separate vote there would be no objection to his or any other gentleman asking for and obtaining a division of the question.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. After the conference report comes in, and a request is made by some one to have a separate vote on these two amendments, would it not be necessary to have unanimous consent to obtain it?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think so; but I think if it were, there would be no objection, and if that sort of contingency should arise, all I can say is that I shall do everything in my power to see that the House has the opportunity to express its opinion upon these two separate propositions, and I think it will have.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to say a word in answer to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. At the time that this matter was first brought before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House a vacancy had not occurred in the circuit court, and Judge Gray, of the United States Circuit Court, declared that he had made every effort possible with the judges who were then available under the law to go into that district to relieve the unfortunate conditions caused by the ill health of Judge Holland, and that he had been unable, with the assistance of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court or in any other way, to man the bench in the eastern district of Pennsylvania in such a way as to materially relieve the congestion there. So that that condition would again obtain if a circuit court judge were to be named in the place of Judge Archbald. Even if the Commerce Court is abolished, the work done by the Commerce Court judges is not to be abolished. That will have to be done in the circuit courts to which the judges of that court will be assigned, and it will then be as difficult as it was when Judge Gray told the Judiciary Committee of the House that he could not get the necessary help for this Philadelphia court.

The gentleman says this creates a bad precedent. It is creating no precedent. It is following a good precedent. In four or five cases the Congress, where a judge on account of ill health has been incapacitated mentally or physically from the performance of labor, has passed a bill of this kind creating an additional judge, with the proviso that when a vacancy occurs upon that bench it shall not be filled. This bill is simply following the precedent of the Texas case, the Baltimore case, and several other cases which gentlemen will remember.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the Ohio case.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman from Indiana further says that he believes that this bill is urged for the purpose of creating a soft berth for somebody rather than by public needs. I introduced this bill, and I want to deny in terms as strong as I can make them any such purpose on the part of anybody who has been behind this proposition from the beginning. It was originally introduced during the last administration, when it was, however, impossible to get it passed through the House on account of the congestion of business here. Lawyers in Philadelphia, regardless of party politics, have urged that this place be created. A committee of the Philadelphia Bar Association, consisting of 12 or 15 men, of whom only 1 was a Democrat, asked that this place should be created.

I have not the slightest notion that anybody knows who would be in the mind of the President for the appointment to this important place. No consideration has been given to the question of who should be the judge and will not be until we shall have passed this piece of legislation. I want to say this further thing, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, that I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], by his tactics in this matter has done a grave injustice to the people in that great district, 2,000,000 or more, who are to-day suffering because this emergency measure of a very urgent character is being prevented from passage by his action. When the bill was originally introduced it was a simple proposition to relieve a judge who was dying and make it possible for the court to continue its business. The gentleman from Illinois has complicated this simple proposition by putting into the bill an amendment which he himself says he does not believe in, which he himself voted against——

Mr. MANN. But I did not put it in.

Mr. PALMER. But the gentleman is responsible for it—which he himself declares is vicious and ought not to be a part of any law. I leave it to him to say whether that kind of intellectual candor or legislative honesty is a right course to pursue in legislation of this character. Now, if that had not been done, the Senate would not have put this matter in a position where we have been compelled to wait for six weeks or more in order to get to a place where we can even have the thing considered, and the gentleman may take what consolation there is from the fact that his course has resulted in the denial of justice to suitors amongst the people of that district, comprising some 2,000,000 of souls. I plead with him on behalf of these people who earnestly insist that their causes ought to be tried and have a right to be tried; on behalf of these people who say that Judge Holland has served this country magnificently and well at a small salary for many years and is now very ill and unable to perform any labor; I ask that he permit them and him to do what in justice ought to be done for the people of that district—put the court in such a place where its business can be continued. Now, as to this Mann-Cullop amendment I do not think it of very much importance anyway. As far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that the President would have no objection to telling the name of every person who indorsed any candidate for a judgeship. I doubt the power of Congress to compel the Executive to disclose such names. It would be directory only; it would be a request probably to the President that he do it. I do not think it is a vital principle one way or the other, but at any rate if you are going to fight out that question and decide what is going to be the law, I say the gentleman from Illinois ought not to have complicated this simple little judgeship matter with it. Even that is now beside the question, because the proposition is to disagree to all these Senate amendments. I hope that neither the gentleman from Illinois nor the gentleman from Indiana will pursue this matter so far as to result in a longer denial of justice to our people.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] endeavors to get his resolution up by making a personal attack upon me——

Mr. PALMER. A personal appeal to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. A personal attack. He says that I am responsible for this amendment in the bill. Well, I offered the amendment on the floor. I did not vote for it. The Democratic side of the House, with a two-thirds majority in this Congress, adopted the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says that there is no principle involved in it. Why, then, was it inserted in the Democratic platform? Most of the Democratic platform is without principle, but I did not suppose that a leading Democrat on the floor, right after having elected his candidate for the Presidency upon a platform which probably he helped to write, would openly come into the House and declare that a pledge in that platform was mere buncombe. [Applause on the Republican side.] When this proposition for the creation of a district judge, involving the plank in the Democratic platform, came before the House, I offered the amendment on the floor in order to see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] dodge. He dodged the best he could, but it hit him just the same.

Mr. PALMER. I did not dodge very much.

Mr. MANN. Now, when he wants to bring it before the House to-day, the Senate having by an amendment stricken out this provision, and the Democratic Senate having violated the platform of its party, I propose when the matter comes before the House to vote to concur in the Senate amendment, and let the gentlemen on that side of the House vote it in or vote it out, just as they please.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman insist that a fair construction, or any construction which is reasonable, of that clause in the Democratic platform, means that there should be this legislation?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly. There is no other construction that can be given to it. That is what it says. The House had adopted an amendment to a bill relating to the northern district of Illinois, the creation of a new district, on all fours, almost, with the pending bill, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] offered an amendment providing that all indorsements should be made public by the President. That was upon a bill relating to a district judge, and following that, the Democratic convention at Baltimore inserted in the Democratic national platform a plank in favor of the proposition, either because they were in favor if it or else because they were told by Mr. Bryan to put it in, he being the father, or daddy, of the idea.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit a moment more, inasmuch as I asked the question, and inasmuch as I voted against the amendment, as the gentleman knows, in both instances, I recollect fairly well the language of the platform, and my construction of it is that whatever binding force it may have affects the Executive, but it does not call upon the legislative branch of the Government to bring about legislation which it can not do under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment was offered in the House in the last Congress because the Commoner was asking it.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a second. It was a part of the legislative program of the House, adopted by the House and approved by the Democratic platform in view of what had taken place in the House.

Mr. HENRY. Does the gentleman think his amendment is well worded?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not have any special pride in it. I copied the amendment in the main from the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and I believe the gentleman from Indiana, on the whole, uses better language than the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman did not vote for the amendment, did he?

Mr. MANN. I did not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I commend him for not doing so, too.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman says he proposes to concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I want to say to the gentleman that I stood by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and if I am present this bill will not go through unless this amendment is left in.

Mr. MANN. All I want is a chance to vote on it.

Mr. CLAYTON. You will have that opportunity.

Mr. MANN. There will be no consideration given to the bill by unanimous consent, and I do not think in any other way, without an opportunity for a separate vote upon the Senate amendment. I have no objection to the consideration of the Senate amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman make that threat on the present proposition?

Mr. MANN. I make no threat.

Mr. CLAYTON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to cut off the cheap political play.

Mr. MANN. On that side of the House. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] usually makes such a play.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAYTON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. CLAYTON (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill which the Clerk first read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill is on the House Calendar and it properly belongs on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Come again. I would not have objected to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. The resolution is on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill itself will be transferred from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar, and the gentleman calls up his resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, after the committee calls are exhausted I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] can delay it a little bit longer.

Mr. MANN. I did not delay it. I did not object to the consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he did.

Mr. MANN. I stated that particularly. The gentleman got impertinent.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; the gentleman from Alabama is always courteous.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen are both out of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. He is never impertinent, but he preserves his rights. And the error made by the Clerk in putting the bill on the wrong calendar will be rectified.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

Mr. PADGETT rose (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was reached).

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MIDSHIPMEN, UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. PADGETT. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2272, the bill to extend the present law with reference to the appointment of cadets.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not need to have unanimous consent. The gentleman calls up bill S. 2272, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

"An act (S. 2272) providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees will have to be finished first.

Mr. MANN. He asked unanimous consent.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That after June 30, 1913, and until June 30, 1919, there shall be allowed at the Naval Academy 2 midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, 1 for Porto Rico, 2 for the District of Columbia, and 10 appointed each year at large: Provided, That midshipmen on graduation shall be commissioned ensigns in the Navy, or may be assigned by the Secretary of the Navy to fill vacancies in the lowest commissioned grades of the Marine Corps or Staff Corps of the Navy."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this bill is for the purpose of adding one naval cadet from each of the districts and States—for how many years?

Mr. PADGETT. It continues the present law for six years. The present law expires on the 30th day of the present month, and this extends it for six years.

Mr. MANN. When was the present law enacted?

Mr. PADGETT. In 1903, to continue for 10 years.

Mr. MANN. This proposes to extend that for how long?

Mr. PADGETT. Six years longer.

Mr. MANN. How many cadets have been graduated or entered under the present law over and above those who would have been entered or graduated provided that only one cadet from a district had been authorized?

Mr. PADGETT. The law that was enacted in 1903 doubled the number of appointments.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but how many cadets have there been under that?

Mr. PADGETT. They have been having ordinarily from 600 to 800 midshipmen. The graduating class has averaged around 150 a year.

Mr. MANN. My information, and I think that of everybody else, is that at present, under the increase in the number of cadets, when the present cadets are graduated—those who are just entering under the existing law—and go into the Navy they would still be, after 30 or 40 years, most of them, practically down in the grade of lieutenant or lieutenant commander. And here the proposition is to add to that difficulty.

Of course, we all know that it is not desirable in the Navy or elsewhere to have men 50 or 60 years of age in the minor positions. Yet that will be the result of the bill if it be enacted.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a very great shortage of officers in the Navy, there is very great need for the officers, and there is a greater need for officers in the lower grades than in the higher. But it is true that under the operation of the present personnel legislation there will be, in a few years, a great hump in the lower grades unless it is remedied by legislation.

I will say to the gentleman that it is being considered by the committee. We have already taken the necessary initial steps to provide during this extra session extensive hearings on this question, with a view to reporting at the regular session a personnel bill for the purpose of reorganizing the personnel and to remedy the situation which the gentleman indicates.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the Naval Committee will do the best it can, but I have not the slightest idea that the House will adopt any provision which may be recommended by the Naval Committee for the purpose of removing this so-called hump, which will come all at once and which necessarily will require either that men be forced out of the Navy before the retiring age or that a large number of additional positions be created in the higher grades which are not needed.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Has the gentleman from Illinois forgotten that we have a plucking board that will relieve the situation he speaks of?

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman from Georgia is mistaken. The plucking board is in part able to relieve the situation when there is no so-called unusual hump. The personnel bill fixes the number who can be retired by the plucking board, but the number fixed in that bill was based on the number then in the service.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Since that time we have increased the number of officers very greatly—by 10 years now of an extra cadet at Annapolis for each Representative and Senator. Of course, those are not all in the service yet, because those just going in have several years to serve. Now, when you add another 6 years of extra cadets you will have a great number of lower-grade officers in the Navy, and the man who enters, unless he happens to be of superior age or rank when he gets in, will not reach the age of a lieutenant commander during his service in the Navy; and lieutenant commanders or lieutenants of the senior grade——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I suggest that it will help some to pass this bill.

Mr. MANN. But the plucking board can only retire so many, and that will not relieve this situation. Nor is the gentleman from Georgia himself in favor of the plucking board.

Mr. TRIBBLE. No; the gentleman from Illinois and I want to abolish the plucking board, but we can not get that matter up before the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. All of these matters will come up for consideration later, at the proper time.

Mr. MANN. Why should they not all come up at the same time, because you admit that you are increasing the evil?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. You say, "We will correct it later." Why not correct it at the time you are increasing it?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not admit that the appointment of these midshipmen is an evil. It is a necessity, and a very urgent necessity, which should be met. This morning I received a letter from the Secretary, very urgently and insistently begging that this legislation be enacted at once for the good of the Navy, on account of the shortage——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has done me the courtesy to show me the letter. I did him the courtesy a day or two ago to say that I would insist on a letter on the subject from the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman has the letter, and I have seen it. I should like to have that letter read. Of course, I know the position of the Navy Department. They think they need the officers. Probably they do, but they think that when they get the additional officers the evil of the so-called hump will be so great that Congress will be forced to create a large number of additional positions of commander, captain, and rear admiral.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 27, 1913.

MY DEAR MR. PADGETT: The extension of the law allowing two midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, one for Porto Rico, and 20 in all at large, is a matter of so much importance to the Navy Department that I beg to present for your consideration some of the reasons for extending the law.

The foremost reason is that the Navy needs the officers, and will need, for some years to come, the output of officers from the Naval Academy that will ensue if the law is extended.

At the present time the bureau of this department charged with the assignment of officers to duty is much harassed to find officers for all the places when they are required and the efficiency of the Navy is impaired for lack of them.

At present 10 of the older battleships and 6 armored cruisers are in reserve or in ordinary; and in addition to these there are many smaller vessels in reserve or out of commission for which officers would have to be provided in case of war; and on board the vessels that are in full commission, as well as on those in reserve and in ordinary, the shortage of officers is seriously felt.

With further reference to the present shortage of officers, the country has at Newport a well-equipped War College for the purpose of teaching officers the art of war, but so few officers are available to go there—so few can be spared from work which must be attended to—that the classes there number but 12 or 15 officers, when there should be many times that number.

The Naval Academy is well equipped to handle the number of midshipmen that the extended law would provide. Its present maximum capacity for the accommodation of midshipmen is 865 with comfort; with crowding, 945. It has for about 10 years been accommodating from 700 to 900 a year, and is well equipped for continuing to do so. Its efficiency would be impaired by dropping back to small numbers, and relatively it would be far from economical to do so. It is believed that if the law is not extended now, its urgency will be so recognized that it is sure to be extended in the near future, and should there be a break of two or three years during which the academy would have to adjust itself to small numbers, and then adjust itself to the increase, there would be loss of efficiency and confusion.

With larger numbers and the prospect of, perhaps, graduating annually a small surplus that would not be commissioned, the competitive feature of work at the academy would be reestablished, and it is believed with resultant good to the midshipmen and to the service.

It is understood that some objection is made to the bill extending the law, on the ground that graduating such large classes will ultimately cause a stagnation in promotion or a so-called "hump" that will seriously impair the efficiency of the personnel. This is true unless something is done toward the proper distribution of officers in the different grades, and it will, even as matters now stand, demand the attention of Congress. This question of distribution to avoid the hump, and of elimination for that and other purposes, will at a future date be brought to the attention of Congress.

Finally, I suggest the desirability of continuing this law now, the officers being needed, and the machinery for producing them all in operation to run on without change.

When the law no longer appears necessary, if ever, it can readily and definitely be changed, but to fail to extend it now, and then to have to do so in the face of the urgent demand that is sure to arise, would not only put the Navy further behind in getting the number of officers it urgently needs, but would appear to be poor policy from all points of view.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, before the letter is read, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question that I should like to ask? Does the gentleman know how many vacancies now exist at the Naval Academy by virtue of the fact that the appointees of Congressmen and Senators have failed to stand the mental or physical examination? Their failure to stand the mental examination is because the curriculum imposed in these examinations is of such a character that the boys between 16 and 21 years of age simply can not stand it and ought not to be expected to stand it.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know the exact number, but there are a considerable number who have failed from one cause or the other. There are a large number of young men who fail on physical defects, and some fail to pass the mental examination.

I will say that during the last year the character of the examination was ameliorated to some extent, and is not so severe as it has been.

Mr. HOWARD. Of my own observation I should like to suggest here that I do not believe there is a Member of this House or a Member of the Senate—I do not care who he is or where he came from or what his experience is—who could stand the examination that is required to-day at the Naval Academy; this statement is substantiated by the fact that out of over 700 candidates for admission only 219 were successful in the last examinations. As a matter of fact, I am informed that there are over a hundred vacancies, and the boys from the country districts can not stand this examination without going to the great expense of attending one of these coaching schools, which precludes the possibility of a poor ambitious boy serving his country in the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. I think that the word that the gentleman has received is an overdrawn picture.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. HARDY. I am glad to call attention to this matter in this public way. It is a fact, as the gentleman from Georgia says, that we may pick out the brightest boys, boys from the colleges—not always from the country—and three out of five or more of them will fail in the mental examination, and about three out of four who do not fail mentally will probably fail physically. It does seem to me that this is wrong. I have two vacancies in my district now, after a number of failures. Some qualified mentally, but fell down on the physical examination, and some failed before they got to the physical. There is something the matter with these examinations. I do not believe that after getting the brightest boys we have they ought to fail in going through the examination successfully. It is almost impossible for a good healthy boy to get through the examination which they require, at least without a preliminary process of stuffing at some special establishment. I wish to put that much in the RECORD.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to make myself clear about the character of these examinations. I was going on to speak about the country districts where so many of the boys come from. As a rule these boys have not had an opportunity to acquire the higher education. Their fathers, as a rule, are not able to send them to Annapolis preparatory schools and pay the men who are engaged in this business, making thousands of dollars in preparing young men for Annapolis. They charge exorbitant fees for that preparation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that it is almost impossible for a boy to pass an examination for either Annapolis or West Point unless he goes to one of these preparatory schools the head of which is friendly with the academy?

Mr. HOWARD. That is absolutely true, and I was coming to that in a minute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say that I have not got a single vacancy in my district, and have not had for some years, and if the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Texas will get the law amended so as to permit it, I can get plenty of boys from the second congressional district in Florida to fill the vacancies.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the district represented by my good friend in Florida has many brilliant young men in it, and he reflects credit on that district as the Representative of these brilliant young men of his district, being a very brilliant Member of the House.

I am making an appeal for the country boy. I believe the best fighters that this country has had were not men with the best education in the past. There is too much red tape about this Naval Academy. It is created by Congress for the purpose of furnishing men efficient and able enough to do the duties upon a naval office. I say in this curriculum and these preparatory schools there is a good deal of chicanery, as my friend from Illinois suggests, and it is charged they have a great deal of influence with the academy authorities, and it ought to be done away with. If it was, you would not have any complaint about the graduating class at the Naval Academy being a mere handful of graduates.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is speaking about political influence. That has all been done away with, because now we have a new political administration.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that our Democratic Secretary has the political pets on the run; but if there is any department in the Government where there was more politics and swivel-chair admirals protected by politicians in high stations it was in the Navy Department of this Government, and every Member of this Congress knows it. [Applause.] I know men in the Navy that have gotten to be rear admirals who, instead of ever commanding a fleet, have never commanded a flat-bottom bateau. They would get seasick before they got 200 yards from shore. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know anything about that; but if my friend will permit me, it is news to me that politics has any influence in the Navy. I have always understood and believed that in all administrations the contrary was true.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind gentlemen that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I yielded to my colleague because he asked me to yield, and I was suggesting things to my good friend from Tennessee so that they may be corrected, and I wanted to call attention to them while this matter was under consideration.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, these suggestions will go into the RECORD and may be read by the administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, there is one observation that I desire to make in connection with the discussion of this subject, which has been brought very close to me, having been in some way connected with the admission of a cadet to Annapolis very recently. That is this: I believe a serious injustice is done these young men in not providing that they shall take the physical examination before they take the mental examination. I know of a young man who came here to this city and who entered one of these schools to which allusion has been made. He did so at considerable expense. He was subjected to a great deal of hard mental work. Now, after months of labor and attention, he finds that there is some slight physical defect which interferes with his admission to the academy. Had this defect been known prior to the expense incurred and the labor involved, it would have resulted to his advantage. I think that our committee in considering legislation in connection with this matter should take this question under consideration and try in some way to relieve these young men of this embarrassment—that after having taken the mental examination to discover the existence of some little physical infirmity which prevents their admission to the academy.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, that matter can be corrected by regulation and it does not need legislation. The department can remedy that by regulation.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I represent the district in New York in which West Point is situated. I want to say that we have so many applicants for West Point that we have to hold competitive examinations. I never knew any political influence to be used in getting a boy through the examinations for admission either to West Point or Annapolis. We hold competitive examinations for appointments to both Annapolis and West Point. I have so many applicants that I have decided to put into effect what are known as the Rhodes scholarship tests on my boys, so that their physical development, their courage, and character and manliness, as well as their mental attainments, will count toward the appointment. I am going to make the physical requirements count fully one-half. I think that is the real way to settle the thing where you can get enough applicants.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The entrance examinations at Annapolis and West Point are too hard and a great injustice to the boy of limited opportunities. Give him a chance. The chairman of the committee just stated he thought this matter could be rectified by the department and should be. I want to say to the gentlemen of this House that I think there should be legislation on the floor of this House, and if we do not correct this wrong here it never will be done.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. TRIBBLE. This matter has been up before the Naval Committee, and I want to say to you here to-day that if you will read the hearings you will discover that I undertook to put some fire behind the department, and I charged in the Naval Committee that very few of the boys of my district could enter the Naval Academy or West Point without going to some school for special training, and that it was not fair to the country boys, who do not have the opportunity of special training, and poor boys, who are not able to attend training schools. I could not get the Naval Committee to take action, and I say that unless the Members of this House force the Naval Committee and the department to take action nothing will be done and it will go on year after year just as it does now.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to corroborate some of the things that have been said. I have discovered that a young fellow has to be an Apollo in physical appearance and has to be almost a graduate of a State university before he can qualify under these examinations. I believe that this House owes it to the young manhood of this country to legislate here and not leave it to the Navy Department and the War Department to say what these qualifications shall be.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the Naval Committee at any time investigated the character of the examinations for cadets?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; we did a couple of years ago, and last year, as I stated a moment ago, the examinations were ameliorated to some extent and the requirements for admission were not so stringent; the requirements for the first year's study were not so severe.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to make a statement, if the gentleman will yield. The chairman is honest in that statement, and he has made the statement before, but I wrote to the department and I asked them to send me the change in the examination showing that the regulation has been lowered, with the amelioration he claims has been made. The department wrote me not less than four months ago that no change had been made.

Mr. PADGETT. I only go upon the statement of the officers.

Mr. POU. If the examinations are so difficult, how does anybody ever get through? I have had a few men get through from my district, and I do not think the district has ever failed to have a representative there.

Mr. PADGETT. There are 150 to 160 or 175 graduated each year.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to make a statement?

Mr. POU. Schley and Dewey got through and many others got through——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been recommending candidates for admission to the Naval and Military Academies for a good many years, and I have taken great pains to inform myself regarding the efficiency of the men I have recommended, physically and mentally. In every case I have required a preliminary physical examination for all the boys I have recommended for a cadetship and their alternates. The difficulty is that the physical examination made by the local physician is not always efficient. That is the fault of the local physician rather than the system. Without further knowledge than I now have as to the character of the examination, although I know something about it, I could not take it myself, there never has been a time when I could have taken it, but that is nothing against the examination——

Mr. PADGETT. Could the gentleman take a civil-service examination?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Without further information as to the views of the examiners and those who pass on the examination I should not want to say that there was such a thing as favoritism, and yet it is exceedingly regrettable that a Member of Congress, whose only desire is to have good, honest, healthy, hardy, hustling young men enter into the military service—I say it is regrettable that a man who has a good deal of experience in the nomination of these men is in some instances inclined to believe that there is, at times at least, some sort of favoritism. If that is not true then it must be true that the examinations are too difficult, or if that be not true then the examinations are an indictment of the entire school system of the Republic.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

Mr. HARDY. Just a suggestion along that particular line——

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment; please let me finish this thought. I have nominated young men who have passed splendidly through high school, young men who have nearly completed university courses, who have not been able to pass the mental examination. It is hard for me to believe the high schools, the academies, and the universities of this country are not thorough, and yet quite recently boys I have nominated, who could pretty nearly qualify as university graduates, have had great difficulty in passing the mental examination, and there is an impression among the boys—I do not know whether it is well founded or not, but it gets abroad—that no matter what a man's qualifications may be he can not expect to pass the examination unless he has attended one of these schools. Now, I occasionally nominate a boy whose parents are not able to send him to one of these schools, and that boy feels that he is handicapped. He is generally informed by some one, I do not know how, that he is likely to fail. Such boys do not always fail, but my experience has been, and I say this with some hesitation, because I do not want to criticize without sufficient ground, that in the cases where they have not failed there may have been some other influence that was helpful to them. I have never thought that there was any political influence in the matter, but I have discovered that it seems to be, and I say "it seems to be," easier to get a boy through the examinations who has some military connection of some sort or other.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And I know it is easier, apparently, for a boy to pass these examinations if he has some pretty good social connections. Now, I may be mistaken about that——

Mr. PADGETT. Well, I rather think the gentleman is.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And I say what I have with some reservation, but views have been forced upon me through a considerable number of years of experience, and I have hoped——

Mr. PADGETT. May I interrupt the gentleman; will he bring his remarks to a close, as I can not yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Just a moment, because I think this is rather important. I have hoped that the Naval Committee can find some way in which to so arrange for these examinations as to at least remove from the minds of the Members a suspicion that everything is not aboveboard and honest and on the square. I hope it is, and yet I have had some peculiar experiences with my nominees to West Point and Annapolis.

I will close with this further suggestion. My impression is, from a knowledge of the young men I have recommended and who have not passed, or who have had a difficult time to pass, that it must be that the examinations are unnecessarily severe, so severe that for the ordinary boys from a country district who have had only a high-school education or education in a local academy, it is exceedingly difficult for them to get into the academies, and I agree with the gentlemen who have spoken that, in the main, and taken as a whole, it is the boys from the small towns and the country districts—perhaps I should not say they are the best, but who are certainly as good material as you can find in the Union. But conditions ought not to be such that there is any suspicion in the mind of a Member who wants to be fair that the average boy from the country district can not get into the academy. If that condition was remedied, we would not need new appointments. We would fill the academy with the provisions we now have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has the floor.

Mr. PADGETT. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 30 minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to add to the experiences that have been mentioned here. In 10 years I have never been able to have a boy pass an examination unless he went to the expense of coming to one of these preparatory schools, and the result has been that I have found it almost impossible to appoint any poor boy to one of these places, unless he could find some friend who would furnish the money to send him to such a school. I have a vacancy existing now, although I have just recently had four boys take the examination.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In just a moment.

At West Point, I have found it even worse. In practically 11 years I have been unable to have a boy graduated at West Point. All of them but one have failed on account of some physical defect found after they entered the academy. One of those boys had an examination, and they found he had trouble with his eyes. Dr. Wilmer and Dr. Green, of this city, among the highest experts in the United States, decided that the medical officers at West Point were wrong, and the Secretary of the Navy reinstated the boy. During the very next year the same physician found the same condition again and failed to notify either me or the boy in time, so that we could take an appeal to the Secretary, and he was dismissed from the academy because of that defect which the best oculists in this city said did not exist.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield in a moment. I promised to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] next, after which I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, this discussion seems to have degenerated, if I may use the term, into a sort of scolding of the Navy Department. I want to add a word to what has been said here, but rather by way of contradiction, of the position that has been taken by some gentlemen. I think probably it is true that the Annapolis entrance examinations are somewhat too difficult and technical. I think that criticism is just. But I do not think it is a just and true criticism to suggest that in order for a young man to get into the Naval Academy at Annapolis it is necessary for him to enter some one of these preparatory schools, particularly the preparatory schools here in Washington.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; if I get more time.

Mr. MONDELL. How long has the gentleman been appointing or recommending appointments of this character?

Mr. WILLIS. I have not been appointing as long as the gentleman has; but the experience I have had, as far as it goes, is as interesting and valuable as the experience of my aged friend from Wyoming. What I was about to say was this: I have heard these suggestions, and if there is any suspicion in the minds of the boys from the country, it comes, I think, from such unfounded and vague criticisms as have been made here this morning. I have heard these objections that it is necessary for a boy to enter a preparatory school, and perhaps some special preparatory school that had some social influence.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that one of the boys that I named, a splendid young man, was so fortunately situated that he was able to enter one of these preparatory schools. He was a splendid boy, and he did good work in that school. He took the examination, and, to my great regret, failed; whereupon a country boy, that never was within 500 miles of any of these preparatory schools, but who depended entirely upon his own resources and made his own way through the public schools and meanwhile supported his old mother, took the examination, passed with high grade, and was admitted to the Naval Academy. While I regret that any of my appointees to Annapolis should have failed, I think that the examinations are conducted on the square. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to add my experience, inasmuch as this is an experience meeting, to what has heretofore been said.

For a time I thought that perhaps this failing to pass was restricted to my district, and I felt humiliated at my experience; but I happened to be present at a dinner down here with the present Speaker of the House, who had gotten up some statistics, and it was marvelous to learn from him that over 600 young men had failed at the two institutions during that current year.

Now, that was a terrible indictment of the schools of this country, so much so that I have always written within the last few years to every boy who wanted to get into the Naval or Military Academy advising him first to get a reputable physician to examine him physically and secure a certificate as to his physical condition. I then write to them and send a list of the questions they have to answer.

Not long ago I appointed a boy from the junior class of the university of my State, a boy of splendid standing, and he failed. Altogether I have appointed about 15 or 16 men, and I believe of those only about 2 have gotten in.

Now, either the public schools or the training schools of this country are in a deplorable condition, or it is intentionally made necessary for a boy to go to these schools at Annapolis and undergo a cramming process that does not do him any good. Those training schools advertise throughout the country that a large percentage of all the boys who go there and spend three months in cramming get through. Now, either these institutions that send out the advertisements are not telling the truth about it, or else those three or four months of cramming enable them to pull through.

But I do not believe that they do a boy a great deal of good. One thing we must do: Either we must lower the standard of examination, or we must prepare a training school at Government expense, so that a Congressman may have one or two boys who may go through a regular course, say, of 10 months at Government expense, so that he may stand the examinations. It is an outrage to have a boy travel a thousand miles at his own expense and, after he has passed his mental examination, to be turned down on some technical physical trouble.

A boy who was very ill able to afford it was talking to me only a few moments ago out at the main door there, who, after spending months at a training school, was subjected to a physical examination and then was found to have some albumen in his urine, and now they tell him he has to go home. I want to have the young man properly examined, to ascertain if he has a serious defect. Something will have to be done or the boys throughout the country, as they are doing in my district, will refuse to come here and take the examinations and be penalized by being turned down. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I have very little patience with the propaganda that is being carried on in some quarters for a greater Navy and a bigger Army, but I believe that West Point, and the Naval Academy have been unjustly assailed in the present debate. The statements that have been made ought not to be allowed to go unchallenged. For the time being I find myself in the rôle of a spokesman for these institutions. For one I can not assent to the statement that a country boy can not secure admission to these schools on his merits, or that he is the subject of any sort of unjust, or unfair discrimination. If we Members of Congress who possess the power of appointment, choose to appoint boys who, by reason of deficient mentality, or insufficient training, are unable to pass the entrance examinations, then the fault is with us, and the boys selected, not with the institutions. No young man who is adequately equipped, or who, in order to equip himself is willing and able to do the necessary preliminary work, in some sufficient school, whether of the special-course type, or otherwise, will find it difficult to pass the entrance examination, either at the Military, or the Naval Academy.

The suggestion that any sort of special influence social, or political is required in order to secure admission to one of these institutions is in my judgment absolutely without foundation, or justification. I have been appointing boys to both of these institutions for a number of years. These appointments have been made under Republican administrations, but this fact has not militated against my appointees. These young men have not enjoyed, and therefore have been unable to exert a particle of influence in any quarter. But this again has not been to their prejudice. They have been appointed on their merits, and on those merits, sometimes with, and sometimes without, a special course, they have been able to enter these schools. Personally I think very highly of these preparatory courses, and always advise my appointees to take some one of them, if he is financially able to do so. Now what has been true with respect to my district, I believe has been, and is now true with respect to every other district in the United States.

As to the examinations themselves, it may be admitted that they are difficult. I have looked over some of the old papers which are sent out as typical of the examinations next to be given, and I fully agree that it is no holiday task to pass one of them. But I extend no sympathy to any of my appointees who complain of their difficulty, and would have them made easier. In substance I say to him, "If you can not pass an examination of that character, and are not willing to make the necessary effort to equip yourself to do so, then stand aside and I will appoint some other candidate who is prepared to make the necessary effort." So far I have been able to find boys in my district, country, or otherwise who have been able to enter these institutions, and pass the entrance examinations with credit to themselves.

What of the fact that these examinations are difficult? There is not one of us in this body who could to-day pass the examinations that he stood when he made his collegiate or professional degree. I have looked over some of the recent examinations for graduation in the department of law at the University of Virginia, and realized that if put to the present test on any one of them I would make anything but a creditable showing.

Honestly I do not believe that I could make 25 per cent to-day on the examination on which I was required to make 83 per cent in order to take my degree in law. Yet shall I undertake to say to the young men who go to the University of Virginia that the standard should be lowered in order that they might the more readily take their degrees? On the contrary I glory in the fact that the standards of all of our institutions have been advanced. To the ambitious young men of my district, rural and urban, I say in the most emphatic terms: "Prepare yourselves to reach up to that standard. Do not ask that the standard shall be lowered for your benefit."

One timely contribution however has been made to-day in the progress of this debate, and that is that the physical examination of the appointee should precede the mental. It is unreasonable, that after a boy has successfully passed his mental examination, he should be rejected for some physical defect of a trifling character. But this is a difficulty that can be easily overcome by changing the order of the examinations.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Suppose I ask the principal of a high school of 400 or 500 members to recommend to me the brightest young man he can, and that young man goes up and fails?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That proves one of two things; either that that boy did not prepare himself as he ought to have done, or that the standard of that high school was not what it ought to be. In one case I went to the western end of my district, where the schools were not very good, and selected a young man from a high school, possibly not so large as the one referred to by my friend from Texas. Without taking a special preparatory course, he passed the examination for Annapolis, and I believe graduates this year.

Mr. HARDY. Then I went to the head of the college and asked him to give me the brightest one there, and he took the examination and failed?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Raise the standard generally in your district, or else raise the standard of instruction in the schools referred to. [Laughter.] If you have no high school or college that can prepare young men for West Point, or Annapolis, send your young men to our Virginia institutions, and we will so equip them that these entrance examinations will not be lions in their path. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman really and honestly believe that out of 400 students in a high school the brightest ones ought not to pass a preliminary examination for West Point or Annapolis?

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the gentleman states that the young men in his district can not pass these examinations while those in my district do pass them, does he mean to suggest that there is some unfairness, or discrimination in the conduct of the examinations?

Mr. HARDY. I do not suggest that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What does the gentleman's proposition mean, unless it carries with it the intimation that equal chances are not afforded to the young men seeking to enter Annapolis, or West Point? Does the gentleman mean to suggest that there is anything unfair, unequal, or unjust in connection with these entrance examinations?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman from Tennessee give me a few minutes more?

Mr. PADGETT. I have not enough time to go around.

Mr. HARDY. I should like a little time.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to both gentlemen.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not in favor of enlarging the Military or Naval Establishments of this Government. I have very little sympathy with the propaganda that is so diligently conducted in certain quarters for a mighty Navy, and an imposing Army, but I believe that both West Point and Annapolis are conducted on a high plane, and I repel the suggestion that there is any sort of sinister, or unfair influence at work by which one young man passes, and another fails. I have appointed country boys without any sort of influence, to both institutions. With no elaborate preparation, and sometimes with no special course at all they have made good. If boys have failed, and many have failed, I believe that the fault is rather with the boys themselves, than with the examinations, or the ratings of those who mark the papers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat on both sides of this question. I believe I am the only man in the second district of Missouri who could not force himself through either one of these schools, naval or military. I believe the examinations are unduly severe. The preliminary examination, intended simply to admit a man to the school where he is supposed to be subsequently educated, seems to me severe enough to fit one for a professorship at Princeton or qualify him intellectually to discharge the duties of President of the United States. There is no sense in the severity of the examination now required, in my judgment, and I am not pleading for the boys in my district, either.

I have served here 14 years and have never missed an opportunity to nominate a young man whenever I had the privilege to do so. I have had only two failures, as I remember, one for failure to pass the mental examination, the other for a physical defect. The first boy I sent to West Point had never been in sight of an academy or high school in his life. The most of the time he attended school in a country district, and a part of the time at the village school. He went to West Point without attending any preparatory school, took the examination there, was admitted, stood every quarterly and annual examination, graduated with high honors, and since then has been teaching languages in the Military Academy. So far as my district is concerned I have had no trouble along these lines.

But I do feel and believe, and every man here must feel, that the test they put the boys through is too severe. I think there is merit, or, at least, that there may be merit, in the contention made here to-day that favoritism has been shown in the admission or rejection of candidates to these schools.

I had occasion at one time to investigate the matter, and I reached the conclusion—possibly a wrong one—that the sons of officers of the Navy and officers of the Army fared better than the boys who followed the plow. That is an outrage, if true. I do not say that it is true, but there are some grounds for suspicion that it is. Every boy should be treated alike. Make the examination such that any boy of good ability—natural ability, intellectual ability, good physical ability—can pass it; treat all alike and there ought not to be any complaint.

I believe with the gentleman from Georgia that the place to correct this injustice and wrong is here and not in the department up on the Avenue. I believe that this Congress ought to require that the standard of examinations or tests shall be lowered and that it be done at once. The severity of examination ought not to be longer continued.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I understood the gentleman to say that the examinations for admission to these schools should be lowered?

Mr. RUCKER. I do.

Mr. MILLER. May I inquire if the gentleman means that the subjects are of too technical a nature, or the character of the questions on the subjects are too detailed and technical?

Mr. RUCKER. Now, the gentleman does not want to embarrass me, but I want to tell him, for it is no embarrassment, that I can not answer him. I do not know; all I know is that the examinations are too severe. I have had no opportunity to study these matters closely, and perhaps would not be able to answer him if I had. I have no doubt the service would not suffer, nor the high character of these schools be lowered, if the examinations for admission were made more reasonable.

Mr. MILLER I know something about it, and the subjects are almost rudimentary, extremely elementary. There is not a subject for examination either at West Point or Annapolis that has not been studied by any boy in a grammar school in a grammar grade in the United States.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, but I think the answer to all the gentleman contends for is that too many boys who are well educated and qualified fail. That is an answer to it all.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me two minutes?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], for whom I have the highest regard, and who is nothing if not intense in all his convictions, that I know he really did not mean what he said when he spoke of the educational institutions of Virginia being competent to equip people, while those of Texas might not be, and further I want to say that I have not charged that any political influence, and I do not charge that any political influence, affects these matters; but the gentleman seems to have given an illustration of influence affecting results. He said he was on the two visiting committees that visit these institutions, and that his boys get through. [Laughter.] I do not know—I am not charging anything.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman say that I said I am on the two visiting committees?

Mr. HARDY. Did not the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I said that I would be loath to be put in the position of defending these two institutions, so strong am I in my antimilitary convictions.

Mr. HARDY. I thought the gentleman said that he was on the two visiting committees?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. I am not within a thousand miles of being on either. I have no sort of association with these institutions in any way, but I just sent a country boy from a country high school, and he got through.

Mr. HARDY. What did the gentleman say about the visiting committees?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Nothing.

Mr. HARDY. Then I take back all I said about that and regret I said it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia to indicate, in respect to the gentleman from Texas, that in Texas they send their brightest men to Congress, while in Virginia they send their brightest men to Annapolis. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. I misunderstood the gentleman from Virginia. In one respect, perhaps, the gentleman from Illinois misunderstood him also. I have not charged any improper influence, but I do say that when the Agricultural and Mechanical College is requested to pick out a bright young man and does so, and he can not pass an examination to admit him to Annapolis, and when the superintendent of my city high school has the same request and his selection can not pass it—can not even show qualifications to entitle him to enter upon a four-year course—it seems to me something is out of joint. I have now two vacancies, and have tried time and again to fill them. Some of my appointees have gone through mentally and failed physically, one, I think, because he hurt his eyes while studying hard to stuff for the mental examination. Somehow, somewhere, there is a difficulty that ought not to exist in filling these places. I do not believe that the standards of mental or physical qualities at the Naval Academy and the West Point Academy show in after life that the boys who do get there are so far superior when they have gotten in there to the young men who graduate from our universities and high schools.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. If I have time, I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to remind my colleague from Texas in reply to the gentleman from Virginia as to the standing of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, that I have just this morning received a letter from a young man in Texas who graduated on the 25th day of June from the Virginia Military College, advising me that he could not take the examination for West Point, and had been so advised by that institution, without making special preparation.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, it has been intimated on the floor in this discussion that candidates for the Naval Academy, at Annapolis, must take a military training in some school here in Washington or at Annapolis or somewhere else before they can pass the examination. Now, if this is true, Mr. Speaker, it ought to be made known. I have the highest regard for the Army and the Navy, and I shall always be found on the side fighting for efficiency in those great defending powers of the honor of this Nation. I named a boy some time ago for the Naval Academy, at Annapolis. He went in training in one of the normal schools in Illinois for one year. He went into the examination and he failed. I saw one of the questions that was supposed to have been put to him in this examination. It was a problem in mathematics. I submitted that problem to a mathematician in the district, who was never known to fail in the solution of any mathematical problem; he solved the problem, but he is dead now. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr MANN. Mr. Speaker, am I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has three minutes remaining.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The House having agreed by unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is it in order to move the previous question before the bill has been read for amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. The bill was read.

Mr. MANN. The bill was not read.

Mr. PADGETT. The bill was read and then debate followed.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The bill was not read for amendment, it was read in the usual course of procedure.

Mr. MANN. If it is in order, and the gentleman moves the previous question without giving anybody an opportunity on this side to be heard, I shall make a point of no quorum.

Mr. PADGETT. I have yielded to a number of gentlemen over there.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has yielded to a number——

Mr. PADGETT. I will reserve my three minutes and yield to the gentleman so that there may be discussion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if there was such an emergency that this bill had to pass in a few minutes, I would not desire to take any time, but it is one of the few occasions when there is an opportunity to consider this matter, and the House has the time. No objection was made to bringing up the bill before the House, although it was brought up by unanimous consent, and a number of gentlemen desire to be heard. The House has no other important business. Mr. Speaker, I have been appointing cadets to Annapolis and West Point for more than 16 years, and 10 or 12 years ago—or maybe longer—I determined that I would appoint no one who was not prepared to say that he would come to a preparatory school in Washington or close to one of the academies. On a few occasions I have waived that requirement. My recollection is that no one of my appointees has ever been admitted unless he went to one of the preparatory schools. Now, I do not know that it is any fault of the academy authorities or those who make the examinations.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Just in a second. In my judgment, the fault is rather with the legislation which contemplates that the boy at the age of 20 or 21 may be as learned as the man is who is admitted to the practice of medicine or law after taking a high-school course, a college course, and then a special college course in his profession. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. I just want to state for the benefit of the gentleman and in justice to both the administration at the academy and also here that they have all along opposed the sending of these boys to the preparatory schools and have been inimicable to the preparatory schools, and have insisted that the boys should have their own training in the home schools.

Mr. MANN. Very well. With my experience, I shall still continue to advise any appointees whom I may select to come to one of the preparatory schools if he intends to get through the examinations.

Now, what is the situation, Mr. Speaker? A boy who wants to become a lawyer or doctor, goes through the grammar school, he goes through the high school, and he goes for four years to the university, and then goes to the law school or medical school for two, three, or four years more, and then if he gets admitted to the practice of his profession it is at the age, probably, of 25 or 26, and he in his work will not have been required to know as much as the boy who comes out of Annapolis is supposed to know when he graduates at the age of 21 or 22.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do you not think in these examinations that the strength and capacity of that boy's mind to learn is more important than the number of things he has already learned?

Mr. MANN. I think it is important that the boy who goes to Annapolis or West Point should have the highest physical standard and be of the select mentally. I do not criticize the careful examination which is made. But the boy who goes into Annapolis may be appointed, I believe, at 16—it used to be about 15—for four years, where it used to be six years. When he comes out, he must have a complete college education, which one would ordinarily get at a college. He must understand the languages; he must be completely informed in mathematics. In addition, he must understand gunnery, he must understand navigation, and he must understand international law, so that he is better prepared on the subject than most Members of Congress would be. The boy who comes out of Annapolis is supposed to know more than any other graduated boy on the face of the universe, and he is too young for it. There ought to be a longer college training for these boys who go into Annapolis. It is not sense to suppose that you can take a boy 16 years of age and give him an ordinary college education, and in addition to that train him in the specialties which he is required to be trained in, and bring him out at the age of 21 knowing more than the man who is admitted to the bar can know after his seven years of college work or the man admitted to the practice of medicine can know after his seven or eight years of college work. We require too much. That has been one fault with the Navy. The Navy at present has too many men in it with superficial knowledge; too few with complete knowledge of some one subject. Not only the boy who comes out of Annapolis is supposed to know all these things, but he is supposed to know something about engineering, seamanship, and navigation.

Before the personnel bill, we used to train them as engineers and as line officers. Now the man who goes into the Navy as an officer is supposed, theoretically, to be able to run the 500 engines that are on board one of the big battleships, electric and steam, and then to step up above and navigate the ship and give the commands in reference to gunnery exercise, and in reference to all the work. No human being can acquire accurate knowledge of all of these things. He may acquire superficial knowledge. That is what we are doing at Annapolis now. We ought to start these boys in at the age of 16 or thereabouts at Annapolis and give them seven or eight years of college training, the first years of it devoted to the ordinary college work and the last years devoted to the specialty subjects directly dealing with the Navy.

I have no desire or disposition to criticize the Navy in regard to it. I think they are doing the best they can with the legislation which we provide for them.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]?

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Members of this House who have had boys fail in entrance examinations at West Point and Annapolis, if they know the kind of questions the boys failed on? I conducted, as chairman of a committee, for Hon. Samuel McMillan, when he was in Congress, a competitive examination, and I have gone over many West Point entrance-examination questions and know what they are and what the Annapolis questions are, and my experience has shown me that the boys fail on grammar-school questions rather than on high-school questions. They fail on things that they have studied years before and have forgotten, and that is the reason why they come to these naval and military preparatory or fitting schools in Washington, because those fitting schools know what line of questions are asked, and they take up those things for review which the boys had formerly studied and which they have often forgotten when they go there for their entrance examinations. The boys usually fail on geography and on English grammar and a lot of the subjects which, if they had been learned thoroughly in their grammar-school work, would have enabled them to pass successfully.

Several gentlemen have said that country boys have passed the Annapolis examination at higher ratings than city boys or boys who have had the training in the fitting schools in Washington. That has been my experience, too. The boys who have been thorough in their grammar-school work will pass those examinations, as a rule.

I think there should be a careful physical examination given to every boy before he goes to take entrance examinations for West Point or Annapolis, and that is the reason why I am going to try the Rhodes scholarship plan in making recommendations of boys for appointment as cadets.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. With pleasure.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In the gentleman's remarks early this afternoon he referred to the Rhodes scholarship competitive examinations for entrance to Oxford University, England. Can he give us a statement of the relative credits in the examinations for those scholarships for physical, moral, and mental attainments?

Mr. PLATT. I can give those credits about as Cecil Rhodes puts them down in his will: Mental examination, 33 per cent, and 33 per cent for manliness and qualities of that sort, and 33 per cent for athletics.

Now, in working out the Rhodes scholarships they have found it difficult to make those things come out in that way. I expect in my examinations to count mental attainments at about 50 per cent, and then to pick out the boys for their athletic standing, manly qualities, and general physical development, and I think for those points 50 per cent should be allowed. I want the boys to pass the mental examination, in the first place, but I would not necessarily select the highest in mental examination if boys obtaining a lower percentage possessed other compensating qualifications. In my district, where I have from 10 to 12 applicants for the Academy at West Point and the Academy at Annapolis, I feel practically certain this plan will work out better than anything else, and I have the indorsement of the Secretary of War. I believe that is the kind of examination that the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis ought to adopt, so that they could pick the boys on the basis of physical development as well as mental development. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUPLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUPLEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RUPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I had assigned to me as Congressman at Large from Pennsylvania the appointment of one cadet to the West Point Military Academy and two midshipmen to the Annapolis Naval Academy. In order to discharge the trust reposed in me in my representative position, and having equally in mind the value of the opportunity to be offered to young men of sufficient qualifications, I held a State-wide competitive examination for admission to both of those institutions. An advertisement of the appointments assigned to me as Congressman at Large from Pennsylvania was inserted in the newspapers throughout the State, and rules following the form prescribed by the institutions were adopted by me. The examiners were appointed from among men eminent in school work, and from a certified list of numbers prepared by the examiners, they not possessing the names of the applicants, I selected from those boys passing with the highest marks one principal and two alternates for the West Point cadetship and two principals and six alternates for the appointments of two midshipmen at Annapolis.

All the principals and all the alternates passed the mental examination for admission to the Military and Naval Academies. One principal failed in the physical examination for admission to West Point. Only one of the appointees had attended a preparatory school for Annapolis. All the other boys were products of the common-school system of Pennsylvania.

Now, I want to say to my colleagues that, in my judgment, the physical examination should precede the mental examination in some orderly way, so that young men should not be subjected to the mental examination who can not pass the physical examination. I believe it is a hardship upon the young men whom we select to undergo first a mental examination, followed by a physical examination, and after qualifying mentally, to fail to qualify physically. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the first question to consider is, What kind of men are desired for the Navy of the United States?

My idea is that they should be men sound physically, mentally, morally; that it is not necessary that they be bookworms or intellectual freaks. My experience along the line of nominating candidates for Annapolis has been very limited but very full. I left at my office this morning two young men who had just finished their examination, one of those young men having been appointed by the Congressman at Large and the other young man by myself. The young man appointed by myself was first turned down on his mental examination, although he stood near the head of a class of 50 in the high school. I asked that he be given a chance to be reexamined and he was reexamined, and he passed that mental examination. Then he was examined physically and was turned down because he had something which was called muttering of the heart, whatever that is. I do not know whether the muttering of the heart was caused by a natural feeling of indignation or whether it was a real trouble, and I am not reflecting upon the medical officers when I say that I do not believe a young man who was examined by his family physician and certified to be in first-class condition was an unfit man for the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, those two young men went back home this morning disappointed and almost broken-hearted. They had spent months in trying to get into the Naval Academy. They come from the very best families of West Virginia, yet they must go back home humiliated, disgraced by the fact that they were not able to get into the Naval Academy of their country.

Mr. Speaker, there may not be anything wrong, but there is a well-grounded opinion among the people that a young man of sound mind and body, unless he comes here to Washington and goes to these preparatory schools at great expense, can not get into our Naval Academy. There is that feeling, and whether it be justified or not I submit to my colleagues that it is a matter that at least should call for investigation. The evidence offered here this morning shows that there are numerous cases where boys who have stood high in their schools and colleges, splendid, robust young men, have been unable to enter our naval school.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this seems to have developed into a symposium of personal experience. I have nothing in that line to relate, because my experience is like the annals of the poor, short, but pleasant.

I do think, however, Mr. Speaker, that there are some principles that may well be considered even in a situation where we are giving our personal experiences. I was very much interested in listening to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], wherein he expressed the opinion that the great difficulty with the instruction at Annapolis is that the course attempts too wide a variety of subjects, resulting in only a smattering of information, incomplete, and lacking in thoroughness. I desire to direct the attention of the House, if I can, to that same criticism as applied to the instruction given in the city schools of the United States upon those subjects upon which the boys are examined for admission to Annapolis and to West Point.

The membership of this House can bring forth illustrations without number of how boys from country crossroads who have studied their American history, their algebra, their arithmetic, their orthography, and their geography, the fundamental, common branches, and have taken these entrance examinations, passing way above boys from the cities and academies and high schools. The trouble, to my mind, is not that the examinations are on too high a grade of subjects, but that the average boy who presents himself for examination has not been thoroughly grounded in those fundamental subjects upon which he has to be examined. The one criticism that the educational forces of the land to-day are recognizing as just toward the system of American public instruction is that we are teaching everything on God's green earth except to teach the boy to think and to develop the mental fiber of his brain strong and true. We lack and lose in mental power in proportion as we spread our mental activities superficially over a wide range of subjects; and the principal criticism that educators are making upon the system of public instruction in the United States is that school curricula cover too many subjects and is that instruction should be intensified rather than extensified, as we have been doing for a quarter of a century. Get back to a thorough study of the fundamentals that go to make up the equipment of the boy who is ready to take up his college course. The high-school graduate has not studied for several years most of the branches in which he is examined for admission to the academies. He probably never studied them so as to become really proficient in them. Therefore special preparation in them is essential before undertaking one of these examinations. Admission to our colleges and universities is generally upon diplomas from an accredited school or upon the possession by the applicant of a certificate showing that at the time he completed a subject he was proficient therein. These certificates may be one, two, or even four years old. Admission to West Point or Annapolis depends upon the proficiency of the applicant on the day he presents himself.

I observed, as I made the interrogation of the gentleman from Missouri a short time ago, that in the examinations at Annapolis and West Point only the fundamental subjects are examined upon, and I think I am right. There was a howl of protest went up from behind me when I said that the average boy of the grammar school had studied all the subjects. I do not take that back. I do not mean to say that he has covered with sufficient thoroughness those subjects, but he has studied them, with the possible exception that in some places the subjects of algebra and geometry are not reached till the first year in the high school. If the boys who present themselves for examination would turn back their efforts and study at home, by themselves if need be, the fundamentals, they would have no difficulty in passing the examination. [Applause.]

I very much regretted to hear the distinguished gentleman from Illinois cast such a reflection upon the high school of his district, the famous high school at Hyde Park, which we of the West have been taught to look up to as the acme of excellence. I believe the boys of that high school——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MILLER. I believe the pupils of that high school are probably securing excellent instruction, but they are not being instructed in these elementary subjects upon which they are subsequently to be examined.

So, Mr. Speaker, if I may indulge in this one general observation, it would be that we should not for one moment seek to lower either the standard of scholarship in, or required for admission to, Annapolis and West Point. [Applause.] The general tendency of the times throughout the land is to increase the rigidity of requirements for admission to colleges and universities. This has been made possible by the general improvement in the instruction in the elementary schools of the land. It is therefore in keeping with the general movement that the requirements of these two schools have been made perhaps a little more rigid in recent years. Do not pull West Point and Annapolis down to the level of poor instruction in the common schools anywhere in America; lift the character of the common-school work up to the standards of these schools. The Naval and Military Academies are called upon to perform a service to our Government and our people more particular and in some respects more important than the service demanded of our colleges and universities. They have reached a world-famed point of efficiency. Keep them there. I have never yet seen a boy who was intellectually incompetent go into a special preparatory school, such as we have heard spoken of, and get into the academy by passing an examination afterwards. I never saw a boy who was properly grounded in the fundamentals such as I have mentioned, either in his home school or by private study at his own fireside, where Abraham Lincoln educated himself, who failed to pass an examination when he did present himself. [Applause.]

In conclusion I desire to protest against the suggestion that favoritism is practiced at either school. If there is a place in our land where a boy stands on his own merits, both in his preliminary examination for entrance and in his subsequent work, it is at West Point or Annapolis. These are our schools of honor, and honor of a nation or an individual was never placed in safer hands than in the authorities of these two schools.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words to what I have already said, and by way of parenthesis I want to congratulate the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] upon the high standard of mentality possessed by the young men in his district. But here is some evidence that you can not refute about these examinations. I am not talking about any particular district in the State of Virginia or in the State of Georgia or any other State or district. But out of this year's class 500 young men failed at the Naval Academy who stood this examination. Now these are the facts and that is the record. There is something wrong somewhere. I have maintained that the public-school system of this country as administered in most States of the Union is an absolute farce, because the school term is too short to thoroughly instruct our children in anything, and the pay of teachers is so meager that those who are well equipped for teaching, and do teach, make a financial sacrifice every day they remain in the schoolroom.

The object of my asking the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, the distinguished chairman of the committee, was to impress upon this House that when these young men who are able from a financial standpoint to put up the money to go to these preparatory schools they were able to get into the Naval Academy and pass the mental examination. Now I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] this question. I see he is not on the floor, but I venture the assertion that 9 out of 10 of the young men he has appointed since he has been a Member of this House have gone to one of these preparatory schools before they entered Annapolis.

Some of my colleagues attempted to construe what I said into a reflection on the country boy. I have cast no such reflection on these boys. On the other hand, it was a plea for these boys who have poor fathers, who are ambitious, who want to enter the service of their country that the curriculum be not put up in the sky where they can never hope to reach it; that they shall be treated as well as those who have the money to put up to go to the preparatory schools.

Some of the questions are absolutely ridiculous. A score of college professors from Princeton or Yale or any of the great colleges in this country could not pass the examination that is required at Annapolis. I do not know anything about West Point. I have devoted some study to the Navy, because of the fact that there, I thought, the greatest injustices were being done. A good suggestion was made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE]. Let me give you a practical illustration of how things are done at Annapolis: A splendid young gentleman from my district, the city of Atlanta, went there. His father, a man in ordinary circumstances, expended about $500 or $600 upon the young man. At the suggestion of friends he sent him to one of these training schools at Annapolis, preparatory to standing the examinations. He stood the mental examination. He got into the academy, and spent his first year laboriously pursuing his studies. Just the other day he came through this town, broken in spirit, humiliated, almost in tears, because of the fact that his father had expended this large sum of money uselessly upon him, and that after he had devoted a year and a half of the best days of his life, fired with the ambition that some day he could serve his country in the Navy of the United States, it was found necessary that he should leave the academy. They put some worsteds in a box and told him to match them, and found out, a year and six months after he had been laboring there, that he was color blind. Why, in the name of common sense, do not these people over there exercise some judgment and everyday sense in the administration of their affairs? Why not examine for such serious defects immediately upon the nomination of the principal by the Senator or Congressman?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have two minutes more, if it is not imposing upon the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more, regardless of whether it is imposing upon me or not. The gentleman never imposes upon anyone.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, that is one case. In justice to these young boys, this physical examination should be held before they are required to stand the mental examination. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] mentioned awhile ago two young men going through here who had been turned down mentally—two splendid specimens of stalwart young Americans.

Those things are happening all of the time, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, why do not these people in authority use some common sense? I would rather have one young man standing on the bridge in a naval engagement with good, hard, sound horse sense than all of the principles of trigonometry, geometry, and everything else crammed into his head. Take that great cavalry leader of the Confederacy, Gen. Forrest. He could not write his name. It is said he spelled coffee, "k-a-u-g-h-y."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I add the following as specimens of questions asked in the examinations which have been conducted during the past several years, all taken from the official pamphlet sent to my office by the Navy Department, and are fair samples of the scope of knowledge required of a 16-year-old boy. The time allowed each question averages about 12 minutes.

Question 2. (a) Give details of Washington's campaign in New Jersey in the winter of 1775–76.

(b) How was the surrender of Cornwallis brought about, and what were the consequences of his surrender?

I will refer to this brilliant question later on.

[June, 1911.]

1. (a) What were the causes of the breaking up of the feudal system? (b) What is meant by the "rise of the free towns"?

2. Write briefly on the following topics: (a) Rienzi, (b) Hanseatic League, (c) Nicaea, (d) Peter the Hermit, (e) Wycliffe, (f) Knights of the Temple, (g) Barbarossa, (h) Roger Bacon.

3. Give a brief account of Frederick the Great.

4. Explain the Renaissance in the following aspects: Inventions and discoveries; art and literature; religion and government.

[June, 1911.]

1. Trace the growth of democracy in Rome previous to the Punic Wars.

Why did not they ask the candidates to trace the growth of Bull Mooseism in Pennsylvania previous to the late presidential election?

2. Explain the Macedonian phalanx and the Roman legion. What were the advantages of each?

3–4. Outline the spread of Christianity in the Roman Empire. (One-half page.)

[April, 1913.]

Question 4. (a) Give an account of Grant's principal achievements during the Civil War.

(b) Mention the chief political parties at the present time, and state the position of each on two important questions.

Why, even my friend from Kansas, the Bull Moose leader, would not be able to answer but two-thirds of this question!

GEOGRAPHY.

[June, 1910.]

Question 1. Locate the following and tell what each is: (1) Aconcagua; (2) Agana; (3) Bab el Mandeb; (4) Brahmaputra; (5) Oahu; (6) Darling; (7) Finisterre; (8) Fundy; (9) Kattegat; (10) Kenia; (11) Guantanamo; (12) Monrovia; (13) Mukden; (14) Nipigon; (15) Palermo; (16) Pechili; (17) Punta Arenas; (18) Scilly; (19) Tucson; (20) Yankton.

They might as well have asked them to locate Dogs Tooth, Buzzards Roost, or Sundance, for which a $50,000 public building was appropriated in the Senate last year.

How many Congressmen, I wonder, can describe the relative tactical advantages of the Roman legion over the Macedonian phalanx? It is doubtful if Gen. J. Cæsar himself could have done so. And how about the spread of Christianity in Rome, ye doctors of divinity and erudite theologians?

When it is remembered that Cushing, who a year or two later blew up the Albemarle and broke the power of the Confederate Navy on Albemarle Sound, one of the most daring exploits in naval annals, failed in ancient history at the Naval Academy and was dropped, the importance of this vital subject can be estimated. This fact, and that of George A. Custer, the dashing Cavalry leader and Indian fighter, who was "found" at West Point on the subject of tactics, would tend to prove that mere book learning in the abstract is not always a safe test of a youth's fitness for the naval or military service. It is said that both Custer and Cushing, after having won imperishable fame, were offered the diplomas which had been previously denied them, and that they each courteously but firmly declined as then superfluous. The world had then awarded them their right to practice their profession, and they very properly regarded the certificates of these schools as unnecessary.

But listen to this—and this question is taken from the examination papers of April 15, 1913, the last one held, the subject being United States history:

Give the details of Washington's campaign in New Jersey in the winter of 1775–76.

Now, the answer to that is very simple, and readily occurred to one bright boy (after having wasted 20 minutes writing on Washington's Monmouth campaign, which occurred two years later—a wild-goose chase into which the wise board artfully led them, expecting them to be entrapped). It is just this: Gen. Washington was not in New Jersey during the years mentioned. Now, is not that easy? Simple as rolling off a log. But who would have thought of it?

What can be the object of propounding catch questions of this character but to confuse and flunk them? Is it fair? Of course it must be assumed that it was intended as a catch question, for the examiners could never have been guilty of making such a blunder themselves in good faith. Perish the thought! Is it any wonder that out of the 219 papers first examined but 41, or less than 20 per cent, successfully passed? The authorities themselves recognized this, which is proved by the fact that the papers were regraded, and many of those who had been notified they had been rejected at first were recalled and admitted.

It is a fact, too, that of the first 20 who had successfully passed the mental test, out of this small percentage to make good, upon presenting themselves for physical examination but 5 of them were found physically sound enough for acceptance. Is not this a commentary on "average efficiency"?

It used to be the pons asinorum the aspirant had to pass before qualifying for ancient honors; now it is no longer the "bridge of asses," but the "bridge of sighs" the poor candidate must cross to attain the prize. And, speaking of that dolorous arch, reminds me: It is not infrequently the case that the poor midshipman candidate is required to critically scrutinize and correct obscure and subtle errors sometimes made in the masterpieces of the greatest poets and prose writers of English literature. For example:

> I stood at Venice on the Bridge of Sighs,
> A palace and a prison on each hand.

Now, What is the matter with that? you ask. Well, only this: One of the examiners had happened to take a trip to Venice, and, crossing the Bridge of Sighs, discovered that there was but one palace and one prison, where there ought to be two.

or else Byron was wrong in his grammar. So the "Pilgrimage of Childe Harold" has been handed over to the American boy to rewrite. And, again, in his "Recessional" Kipling was rash enough to say:

The captains and the kings depart,
The shouting and the tumult dies.

Of course, rhetorically speaking, "die" would have agreed better with the plural substantive used as a subject, but a little mistake like that did not feaze Rudyard or prevent his being the greatest living poet to-day as well as an acknowledged master of literature of every kind. Yet he again is passed up to the western and southern boy to be viséed up to date.

All of which only goes to show that were Lord Byron and Rudyard Kipling—not to mention "T. R."—to present themselves for admission to Annapolis they would, undoubtedly, each be turned down in English.

But the examiners have not as yet asked the candidates to define and parse "spizzerinktum," the stunning new word advertised in burning red letters in the street cars and which a local paper has discovered in that monumental work, the New Modern Dictionary, which sells for 81 cents per. Probably this variety of etymological rara avis will be captured by the board and inflicted upon the unhappy candidates on the next examination. It is not at all surprising that one boy, in answering the question "Locate Mona Lisa," fixed its position accurately on the map by writing, "Mona Lisa is an island just west of Porto Rico." It is comforting to feel that the authorities of the Louvre will now be able to recover it. Another one thunderstruck the board and covered himself with glory by giving as a reason for science not being able to utilize the energy of Niagara the following expressive, if laconic reply: "Dammit, you can't." He was rejected. Another Texas boy, driven to desperation by the diabolical character of the questions, handed in his papers in disgust, bearing this defi: "This board may go to hell; I'm going to Texas."

Now, what were the causes of the greater number of physical rejections? Here are some: "Unscientific dentition," which, being translated, probably means poor dentistry; "incisor and bicuspids missing"; "non- or imperfect articulation"—not of speech, but of teeth; "cavities unfilled"—but how about appointment vacancies; do they count? "astigmatism and myopia"—whatever they are; "ozena, polypi, or an exacerbation of pathognomonic symptoms, indicating a tendency toward inheritable phimosis"—of course, if he has that he ought to be turned down; "ingrowing toenails"—who has not got them? "hammer toes and flat feet"—a common and simple defect; "overbite and occlusion"—of the snapping-turtle variety, possibly.

If all these ailments were made lions in the path for political honors, how many, let me ask, leading Congressmen would we have in this august body, to say nothing of the more pretentious disabilities, in common with rejected midshipmen candidates, such as impaired mentality, weak or disordered intellect?

A number of the mentally successful candidates were ruthlessly turned down because they could not hear a watch ticking at a distance of 40 inches from the ear, with the "modifications produced by changes in pitch and tone," as the pamphlet gravely informs us, until it was discovered the watch had stopped. Some people who can not hear a watch or clock ticking manifested by the thunderous swinging of the pendulum of eternity, yet, nevertheless, are attuned to such a nicety in hearing as to readily distinguish an invitation, however subdued, to take a drink; that is to say, they can hear anything of any importance. There are others who manage to get along through life without serious discomfort who have not the ability to detect the ticking of a watch—even a Waterbury. It is safe to say that even the Capitol captain of the watch can not always hear it at a distance of 40 inches.

Though the Naval Academy authorities make a bluff at discouraging parents sending their sons to special preparatory schools on the ground that it tends to remove the susceptible youth from refining home influences and subjects him to the doubtful influences of new environments and surroundings among strangers in a strange place, yet it is a well-known fact that there is not an officer in the service who does not regard these schools as an absolute necessity for a boy's proper preparation or who will not at any cost keep his son or sons there as long as possible should he be lucky enough to secure an appointment. There is not an officer who does not know that the boy's success depends upon a special, rigid preliminary cramming, no matter what his previous schooling has been. As proof of this: In 1907 President Roosevelt appointed five principals to the Naval Academy. All were the sons of naval officers. One of them had just graduated with highest honors from a high school in Brooklyn. His diploma and the certificate of the principal of the school pronounced him to be the brightest pupil the school had turned out. He was regarded as a prodigy. His father, who was a gunner and whose pay as a warrant officer was too small to stand the expense of extra tuition, feeling that his son's success was certain, omitted the preparatory school essential. The remaining four enrolled, all at Annapolis schools. All took the examination at the same time and all passed and finally graduated except the Brooklyn boy, the son of the gunner, who failed lamentably. The sons of guns rejected him.

This is but one of numerous examples which might be given of the effect of special coaching schools. Here is a letter from the Army and Navy Register of May 31, written by an officer, himself a graduate of the academy, to the principal of one of the two Annapolis schools, the one usually patronized by naval officers and whose record for success is of the highest. The letter speaks for itself.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1913.

Having successfully prepared two of my sons for the Naval Academy, each entering on the first trial without the slightest difficulty, and both being rated with very high percentages, I feel impelled to express to you my very grateful and sincere appreciation of your able coaching, which contributed so materially to the successful realization of my boys' aspirations.

With only three months at your school, one attending in 1907 and the other this year, the results achieved in both cases were signally marked, for though both were good students and well advanced for their ages—16—and both had passed through high school, I doubt very much if either could have stood the mathematical test without the careful and thorough drilling you gave them. One, having graduated, is now, as you know, an ensign, the other a midshipman.

I do not hesitate to recommend your methods in preparing candidates for entrance, viz, close and constant personal supervision, with especial adaptation of the work to suit the individual boy, the degree of his advancement, alertness, etc., as well as your especial ability in your particular line as a mathematical instructor. And as for being a "coach," why, you are the whole outfit—a "coach and six," with postilions, footmen, and outriders thrown in, not to mention the highwaymen!

If I had 50 sons (which God forbid!) instead of only 4 (which I am proud to say I have), you should have them every one to train. As soon as the other two get old enough to secure appointments you shall have them.

If only your school had been in existence during my day, how many poor "busted candidates" would have been saved to be embalmed among future heroes and a paternal Government been made that much poorer!

The following compilation of the results of the examinations during the years 1908–1912 shows what happens: Number examined, 3,054. Of these, there failed in the subjects mentioned as follows: English—grammar and composition—938; geography, 870; history, 945; arithmetic, 1,289; algebra, 1,665; and geometry, 1,529. This exhibits the apparent paradox of an aggregate of 7,236 failures out of but 3,054 who took the examination, or more than 200 per cent. But this, of course, can only be accounted for on the ground that all the failures fell short on two or more different subjects, and this, too, after many of them had been reappointed and were allowed reexaminations. Of the total number examined during the five years above computed but 1,247 passed, which number includes all the alternates as well as principals examined, many of whom, of course, were not admitted because their principals, too, had passed.

This, perhaps, will go toward explaining why my friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has not been able to get any of the bright boys of his district into the Naval Academy for the past 10 years.

Finally, in the face of the refreshing assurances made on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], it is presumed, upon the authority of the naval officials themselves, that the examinations have this year been made much easier, we have the cold facts that out of 500 failures on the February and April examinations 303 of them were given a third examination June 5—reexamined on the very same subjects, knowing the scope and character of the examinations, the very identical kind of questions they were before asked—and of these 303 but 74 passed, less than 23 per cent. Figures will not lie.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I think one weakness of the American people, public men, editors of our public press, and very often it creeps into both Houses of Congress, is a tendency to discredit our public officials. We will not find this mistake in any foreign Government. We are too apt and too anxious to find fault with our system of government and our administration of public affairs. I firmly believe the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis are two of the best institutions of the kind in the world. No country has educated better men, better or braver fighters on land and sea than these two splendid institutions. The men who compose the faculties of these institutions certainly have the best interest of our country at heart, and I say that the criticism of them, direct or indirect, is unjust. And I most heartily commend and indorse the defense made of these institutions by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. We have four committees of the House and the Senate—the Military and Naval Committees—which give this subject of legislation affecting these institutions careful and conscientious study and consideration. Then we have selected by Congress and the President of the United States annually boards of visitors, men who are vitally interested in the welfare of the students and of the institutions, who go there and carefully investigate and thoroughly examine into the affairs and management of those institutions. Every few months there sail into our harbors foreign naval officers, some of them here last week from the Argentine Republic. They visit West Point and Annapolis, and the favorable comments that they make upon those institutions ought to be a matter of gratification and pride to the American people.

They are the best-managed and most efficient and thorough institutions of their kind in all the world, and the American people owe a debt of gratitude to the men who have made the successes of the training and education of the men who have gone out from Annapolis and West Point and gained honor, glory, and greatness for our country. There has not been a vacancy from the district I represent since the Civil War, and I have a waiting list now for appointments at those two institutions. The principal I nominated for Annapolis recently attended one of these preparatory schools for three months. He failed on his examination, but one of his alternates, Moses B. Byington, jr., without any preparation in one of these preparatory schools, from a country high school, passed a creditable examination. That is proof in itself that the statement that these preparatory schools exercise a wrongful or unjust influence on the examinations is not well founded. There is no influence or political pull in the admission of these students or on their monthly or quarterly or annual examinations. I have had some personal knowledge in this matter. I had a son graduate at Annapolis in 1905, and I frequently visited Annapolis in that four years, and I had many opportunities to look into the management of that institution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, for the consolation and comfort of those Members who say that they can not find students in their districts to pass these examinations I desire, without malice, to state a little instance that occurred on the floor of this House several years ago. My late colleague, Mr. Brownlow, from the first Tennessee district, was approached by a Tennessee colleague, and he said: "Brownlow, why is it that every time we have a civil-service examination at Knoxville, Tenn., the applicants from your district pass and all from my district fail?" Mr. Brownlow's reply was: "Why, it is a good thing for you that your applicants can not pass these civil-service examinations." His colleague said, "Why?" In answer Mr. Brownlow said: "If they could pass civil-service examinations somebody else would be representing that district in Congress." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to hear my good friend the Representative from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] almost denounce the public-school system of the United States. I can not believe that he represents in that criticism or denunciation the feeling of the people of his State with regard to the public-school system of this country. In Iowa, where we have the highest percentage of literacy of any State in the Union, the people glory in the public-school system as perhaps the brightest jewel of the Republic, and I do not believe that we should cast upon the high schools or public-school system of this country discredit because those who come from them fail to pass these examinations at the Naval and Military Academies.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very significant fact, which I desire to call especially to the attention of the House, that we have heard here the testimony of the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN], the Representative from Illinois, saying that he would not appoint a man to a position to either of these academies unless the applicant would take a few months of special preparatory work at one of these preparatory academies. I talked with a Member of Congress who for more than 20 years had served in this House, and he told me that he never had made a recommendation that had gone through except they had taken this preparatory work at one of these preparatory academies.

Mr. Speaker, it is furthermore a fact that I learned from conversations with these students themselves that they believe that there is little chance for the young man unless he does take this special preparatory work at one of these schools. Now, I do not say that this means necessarily that favoritism has been shown in allowing those to go through who have taken this preparatory work, but I do say that there is something wrong in a system which will allow 60 to 75 per cent of those who have taken a cramming of three months, given them by a preparatory school, to then successfully pass after that cramming, when equally able young men, coming from schools, high schools, and some of them from the colleges of this country, are unable to pass the examination or to get through.

Gentlemen have said here that what we needed was a more thorough preparation in the high schools and in the public schools, but can it be considered that a thorough preparation, that with three months in one of these preparatory schools, can so fix up the mentality and the equipment and the profound knowledge of these subjects that will enable 60 or 75 per cent of these boys to pass? In my judgment, there is something wrong in the system of examinations somewhere. I do not know where it is, but we certainly ought to find out. Those young men who are to go into the Navy or into the Army—in the service of their country—ought to be sound physically. We all admit that. They ought to be intelligent. We all admit that. But they ought not to be compelled to incur the expense or take the time of a three months' preparation in an academy at Washington or Annapolis as a requisite for admission into the national schools for preparation for service in the Army and Navy of the United States. Such a condition imposes an unjust handicap on the poor boy who can not afford the additional expense, and adds a burden not contemplated nor authorized by the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as we all know, there were no committees appointed for the present Congress until some time in June. I do not remember just the exact date. But we all know from several votes in the House of Representatives in the last Congress it was the fixed and determined purpose to abolish the Commerce Court. Without a committee to which a bill could be referred, I introduced a bill, H. R. 1921, which simply embraced the provisions of the appropriation bill that had been passed abolishing the court, but which had been vetoed. I did that for the purpose of moving to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and to avoid the contention that the bill had not been considered by any committee—by introducing and passing simply the legislative provisions in the appropriation bill which had been considered, and which was passed over the veto of the President.

At the request of the chairman, I carried that bill to the Attorney General, the Hon. J. C. McReynolds, and asked for any suggestions that he might have to make, stating to him plainly that the question as to whether the court was to be abolished or not was not to be considered by him, for we had settled that already. I received the following letter from the Attorney General, dated May 6, 1913, which reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1913.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: As you requested, I have considered your bill (H. R. 1921) abolishing the Commerce Court with a view to giving you some aid about the jurisdiction of the courts.

Irrespective of the policy of the measure, upon which I express no opinion, I venture to suggest, in line with your views—

1. Venue: As drawn, the bill would probably permit the railroads a choice of a considerable number of districts, and I should think it would be desirable to fix the jurisdiction more definitely by law.

I don't think of any better method than to return to the method which existed prior to the establishment of the Commerce Court, which was generally the district in which the complainant resided or, if a corporation, had its principal operating office.

2. Interlocutory injunctions: I think the bill should explicitly prohibit any court from issuing an interlocutory injunction unless they specifically find that the validity of the commission's order is seriously doubtful and that the irreparable injury to the petitioner from its enforcement pendente lite would be substantially greater than the irreparable injury to the beneficiaries of the order from its suspension.

3. Temporary restraining orders: I suggest the elimination of the provision for temporary restraining orders, because under the law there must be a period of at least 30 days after the order before it goes into effect (sec. 15 of the act to regulate commerce), and this ought to allow plenty of time for the railroad to make its application for the ordinary interlocutory injunction provided for by your bill. Also, the commission has not made difficult the matter of extending the effective dates of its orders where the occasion justified.

4. Supreme Court Justices: I suggest that the requirement that the Supreme Court Justices participate in the hearing of applications for interlocutory injunctions be eliminated because that court is so heavily overburdened already and because it would be very inconvenient for them to be traveling about to the districts where hearings are to occur, or for the judges of those districts to come especially to Washington.

5. Appeal: The provisions for an appeal, on page 4, lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, are probably inadvertent because the subject is covered by similar provisions on page 2, lines 15, 16, and 17.

6. Remand: There should be some express provisions for remand of cases now pending undecided in the Supreme Court.

7. State commissions: At page 4, lines 12, 13, and 14, I assume that "any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State" means any "public-service commission," etc.

8. Record, findings, limitation of review, and certiorari: To expedite these cases as much as possible and to limit the court review to questions of law, perhaps you might wish to incorporate some such sections as I have drafted and attached at the end of your bill, numbered sections 6 and 7.

I have also suggested these sections to Mr. BROUSSARD in connection with the bill I understand he proposes to introduce, because I think that Congress may desire to subject any court, whether the Commerce Court or the district court, to these limitations.

9. Numbering: For purposes of reference and litigation it is so much more convenient to have the bill broken up into sections that I have ventured to suggest this on the text of the bill.

On the attached copy I have indicated changes which would accomplish these suggestions, if you should conclude to accept them.

Very respectfully,

J. C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Then, on the 22d of May, 1913, I received the following letter from the Attorney General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1913.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I am sending you herewith a copy of a letter from my friend, Mr. Hines, who for a long time has been connected with interstate-commerce litigation as a representative of the railroads. What he says is always worthy of very serious consideration, and I commend his suggestions to you.

Very truly, yours,

J. C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General.

Inclosure: Copy of letter from Walker D. Hines, Esq., dated May 21, 1913.

The copy of the letter inclosed from Mr. Hines is as follows:

CRAVATH & HENDERSON,
New York, May 21, 1913.

Hon. JAMES C. MCREYNOLDS,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCREYNOLDS: Referring to my letter of 7th instant, relative to H. R. 1921, introduced by Mr. SIMS, which bill, I presume, is intended to be superseded by H. R. 4546, introduced by Mr. SIMS, the latter being apparently of the same tenor, and to my conversation with you yesterday.

Section 206 of the Commerce Court chapter of the judiciary act (36 Stat. L., 1148) provides that the Commerce Court's orders, writs, and process may run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States. This section does not purport to deal with either the jurisdiction or the procedure of the Commerce Court, but defines certain of its powers, including the power to issue process, and therefore the Sims bill would not continue that section in force, but would be regarded as repealing it.

It is well established that, independently of express legislation, a district court of the United States can not issue process beyond the limits of its own district, but that the process can only be served upon persons within the same district. (Toland v. Sprague, 12 Peters, 300; Herndon v. Ridgway, 17 How., 424; United States v. Union Pacific R. R., 98 U. S., 569.) I do not understand that sections 51 to 57 of the district courts chapter of the judiciary act (36 U. S. Stat. L., pp. 1101–1103) would empower the district court to issue process running beyond the limits of the district in cases brought under the Sims bill, either to enforce or set aside orders of the commission.

With respect to suits brought to enforce orders of the commission, it would be a matter of great importance to the Government to have adequate provision for process of the district court running into other districts and States.

With respect to suits brought by railroad companies to set aside orders, I doubt if the question would be so important, because I believe the bill as a whole would evidence an intention on the part of Congress that the United States might be sued in any district, and that the court would find some way to hold that the Government was duly before the court. Even in such suits, however, the matter might be of importance if it should be desirable to bring in other defendants besides the United States.

On the whole, I believe it very important to the Government, and desirable to carriers, that there should be an express provision in the Sims bill that in all suits covered thereby the process of the district court shall run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States.

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

After I saw the committees were going to be appointed before all appropriation bills were brought in, I had prepared as best I could, with all the help I could get, the bill H. R. 5611, and after having received the kind of a letter I did from the Attorney General, I felt it would have been an absolute discourtesy to him not to submit that bill to Mr. Hines for his suggestions. I did so, and I received the following letter from him with reference to the bill, dated June 2, as follows:

CRAVATH & HENDERSON,
New York, June 2, 1913.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: I feel greatly complimented that you have written me in regard to H. R. 5611, and shall do my best to comply with your request.

I understand your purpose to be to transfer to the district courts the jurisdiction now vested in the Commerce Court, and to provide for the employment in the district courts of practically the same procedure that is now employed in the Commerce Court, and to do all of this with the least change in the law, so as to avoid, as far as possible, changes of an affirmative character which will call for construction by the courts.

Accordingly I have the following suggestions to make:

The Commerce Court act provides:

"Its orders, writs, and process may run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States."

H. R. 5611 provides:

"The writs and processes of the district courts may in these cases be issued at (I understand the word 'at' is to be changed to the word 'to') any place within the United States."

Would it not be better to copy in this respect the exact language of the Commerce Court act, so as to avoid the possibility of any court assuming that the change in the language was intended to bring about a change in the meaning? You will note the Commerce Court act uses the word "orders" as well as the words "writs and process."

Therefore, would it not be better to follow precisely the language of the Commerce Court act, so that the language would read:

"The orders, writs, and processes of the district courts may in these cases run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States."

The Commerce Court act provides as an exception—

"that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner, said court, or a judge thereof may, on hearing, after not less than three days' notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Attorney General, allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part of the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the order of such court or judge, pending application to the court for its order or injunction, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding, based upon evidence submitted to the judge making the order and identified by reference thereto, that such irreparable damage would result to the petitioner and specifying the nature of the damage. The court may, at the time of hearing such application upon a like finding, continue the temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part until its decision upon the application." (Sec. 208 of the judiciary act, 36 U. S. Stat. L., p. 1149.)

H. R. 5611 requires the application for a temporary restraining order to be made to three judges and on five days' notice, and thus puts the matter on practically the same basis as an application for a temporary injunction and wipes out entirely the plan of the Commerce Court act, which contemplates that an application for a temporary restraining order may be made to a single judge of the court and on three days' notice. Indeed it will be much more important in the district court to have an opportunity to apply for a temporary restraining order to a single judge than it has been in the Commerce Court. In the Commerce Court, generally speaking, a majority of the members of the court is always available in Washington, so that an application can be made to them without serious inconvenience. But if the Commerce Court should be abolished, it would be rarely the case that three Federal judges of the required grade would be found together in any one place, and it would be necessary before the petitioner could make an application for him to prevail upon the judges to go to some place where they could sit together and hear the application for a temporary restraining order. This may be a matter of most serious consequence, and it may become utterly impracticable within the time before an order is to take effect to get the judges assembled who are qualified to pass upon the application for the restraining order.

Under such circumstances it is highly desirable to preserve the procedure already recognized by the Commerce Court act and to permit the application for the temporary restraining order to be made to a single judge. This matter was quite carefully considered by Congress in connection with the act regulating the issuance of injunctions by Federal courts against State railroad commissions, and it was there recognized that it would be necessary in many cases to make an application for a temporary restraining order to a single judge on account of the physical impossibility of getting three judges together within the limited time.

Of course, if an order of the commission is unlawful and will be set aside when the court comes to consider it, it will be far better for everybody concerned to have the order temporarily restrained while the court is considering the motion for a temporary injunction. Otherwise the commission's order will go into effect for a short period of time and will completely upset the existing tariffs and the existing trade relations, and then there will be a further reconstruction of the situation when the temporary injunction shall be granted. This is peculiarly a situation where the status quo ought to be preserved in cases of irreparable damage. Of course, after obtaining the restraining order the petitioner will have to proceed promptly to make his application for temporary injunction to the three judges, and the restraining order will remain in effect only until the three judges shall have passed upon the application for the temporary injunction.

For the same reasons it would be better to preserve the three days' notice for application for temporary restraining orders, thereby preserving the provision of the Commerce Court act instead of extending the notice to five days.

The only other suggestion I have is that under the Commerce Court act there is specific provision (sec. 210) that—

"a final judgment or decree of the Commerce Court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States if appeal to the Supreme Court be taken by an aggrieved party within 60 days after the entry of said final judgment or decree."

There is no provision in the same language, or substantially in the same language, in H. R. 5611. But there is a provision in lines 3 and 4, on page 4, that the same procedure as to expedition and appeal shall apply upon the final hearing of cases as applies with respect to orders granting preliminary injunctions. The question occurs to me whether there may not be danger that the court will construe this as meaning that there may be no appeal at all upon the final hearing except where the final judgment or decree grants an injunction against the commission's order. I am satisfied this is not the intention, and I think it quite doubtful as to whether the court would place such a construction upon the provision. But understanding from your letter that you desire to put the matter upon substantially the same basis as it now is, it has occurred to me that you might think it advisable to clear up this question entirely.

In conclusion, I suggest for your consideration whether it might not be a good plan, after transferring the jurisdiction to the district courts and providing for the venue, to repeat practically verbatim the provisions of the Commerce Court act. This will reduce to a minimum any danger there may be of new questions being raised and new constructions insisted upon or allowed.

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

I then wrote him, acknowledging receipt of his letter, and inclosed to him the following proposed amendments, along the line of his suggestions in three particulars, which I will put in the RECORD, but stated I could not agree to one of his propositions, and that was that a petition for a preliminary restraining order should be submitted to a single judge, because there seemed to be great opposition by those who were in favor of continuing the court to having petitioners who bring suits to enjoin the orders of the commission submitted to particular judges that the petitioners might select, but providing for three judges instead of one, as the law had formerly been as to issuing preliminary restraining orders, which had my opposition:

(H. R. 5611.)

In lines 20, 21, and 22, on page 2 of the bill, the words "The writs and processes of the district courts may in these cases be issued to any place within the United States" should be stricken out, and in lieu thereof the following words be inserted:

"The orders, writs, and processes of the district courts may in these cases run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States."

Insert, in line 25 of page 3, after the word "case," the words:

"Provided such appeal be taken within 30 days after such preliminary injunction or restraining or stay order is granted."

After the word "apply," in line 4 on page 4, insert the words:

"A final judgment or decree of the district court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States if appeal to the Supreme Court be taken by an aggrieved party within 60 days after the entry of said final judgment or decree, and such appeals may be taken in like manner as appeals are taken under existing law from the Commerce Court to the Supreme Court."

I then received the following letter of June 9 from Mr. Hines, a long letter, giving his views as to the amendments I offered, and making further suggestions, which reads as follows:

CRAVATH & HENDERSON,
New York, June 9, 1913.

DEAR MR. SIMS: I greatly appreciate, and have read with great interest, your letter of the 5th instant. My reply is delayed because of a trip to Chicago which occupied the last four days of last week.

First. The amendment you propose in lines 20, 21, and 22, on page 2, will fully meet the point made by me. That amendment contemplates the striking out of the words "the writs and processes of the district courts may in these cases be issued to any place within the United States," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The orders, writs, and processes of the district courts may in these cases run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States."

Second. The amendment you propose, in line 25, on page 3, after the word "case," by the addition of the words "provided such appeal be taken within 30 days after such preliminary injunction or restraining or stay order is granted," raises a question which had before escaped my attention, and that is, that under the Commerce Court act, while provision is made for an appeal to the Supreme Court from an interlocutory order granting or continuing an injunction restraining the enforcement of an order of the commission (which, of course, means a preliminary injunction), no provision is made for an appeal from a restraining or stay order, and I think perhaps you will agree with me that there is no necessity for an appeal from such an order. The restraining or stay order is merely a temporary order, which is made to preserve the status until the application for the preliminary injunction can be heard and determined. It would seem unnecessary to provide for an appeal from a temporary restraining order to the Supreme Court, because that order would either be terminated or superseded by the lower court's action upon the application for the preliminary injunction long before the appeal would, in the ordinary course, receive the Supreme Court's consideration. Under any proper practice the temporary restraining order should be but of short duration. It should be followed promptly by the hearing upon the application for the preliminary injunction.

If the court denies the preliminary injunction, that denial will terminate the temporary restraining order. If the court grants the temporary injunction, that act will supersede the temporary restraining order, and then the appeal will be from the preliminary injunction, and not from the temporary restraining order. My suggestion, therefore, would be to strike out the words "or restraining or stay order," in line 25 of page 3, and also the same words in your proposed addition.

Third. Your third amendment makes it clear that there may be an appeal from a final judgment or decree of the district court. Would it not be well in connection with the insertion of this amendment to strike out from line 4 of page 4 the words "and appeal," because the additional sentence you propose to insert takes care of the subject of appeal?

Fourth. As to permitting action by a single judge, I see that I did not make clear in my former letter the distinction between the temporary restraining order and the preliminary injunction. You are entirely correct in saying that under the Hepburn Act the preliminary injunction had to be granted by the court, which had to consist of not less than three circuit judges by virtue of the expedition act of February 11, 1903, which the Hepburn Act made applicable to suits to set aside orders of the commission. But this was not the case as to the temporary restraining order. The Hepburn Act contained no provision as to the temporary restraining order, and consequently such temporary order could be made by a single judge. I presume that this was done by virtue of section 718 of the Revised Statutes, which provided:

"Whenever notice is given of a motion for an injunction out of a circuit or district court, the court or judge thereof may, if there appears to be danger of irreparable injury from delay, grant an order restraining the act sought to be enjoined until the decision upon the motion; and such order may be granted with or without security, in the discretion of the court or judge."

While I have not had time to review the history of the matter, I have a very strong impression that frequent instances arose where the single judge granted a temporary restraining order in cases brought under the Hepburn Act, but, of course, such orders were very soon terminated or superseded by the action of the court consisting of three judges. My only object, therefore, is to preserve under your bill the same condition which I understand has always existed both under the Hepburn Act and under the Commerce Court act, whereby a single judge, in cases of danger of irreparable injury, has always had power to grant a temporary restraining order, which would preserve the status until the court should have an opportunity to hear and determine the application for the preliminary injunction. I think the distinction which I make between a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction answers the point made by you that it ought not to be permissible for the complainant to select a particular judge. It will be of no substantial advantage whatever to the complainant to get a temporary restraining order unless it can be promptly followed up by a preliminary injunction. Hence, if the preliminary injunction can be granted only by a court of three, there is no danger of abuse from the issuing of the temporary restraining order by a single judge, since such order will be speedily terminated or superseded by the action of the court of three. I may add that this matter was the subject of reconsideration in connection with the act which now provides for the court of three judges to try suits brought to prevent the enforcement of State statutes, and the justice of permitting a single judge to grant a temporary restraining order pending the opportunity for a hearing and determination of the application for a preliminary injunction was again recognized. Therefore the change I am suggesting is a very narrow one, and is intended to preserve a right which has always been recognized and which is very different from the right of having the application for the preliminary injunction passed upon by a single judge.

I may add that while the commission gives not less than 30 and frequently 60 days or more before its order becomes effective, yet the conditions are always so complex that a great deal of labor is requisite in order to make an accurate presentation of the case to the court, and it may well be that practically the entire time limit may be consumed in making a presentation which will be intelligible to the court. Consequently, it may be of very great importance to permit the carrier to get a temporary restraining order from a single judge so as to preserve the status until three judges may be assembled to hear and determine the application for the preliminary injunction. I am very hopeful that you will agree with me that the criticism and dissatisfaction which have existed in this matter have been with reference to the granting of preliminary injunctions by a single judge rather than with reference to the granting of a temporary restraining order, which, if properly guarded by statute, as it is under the Commerce Court act, is a purely temporary expedient which will be speedily terminated or superseded by the action of the court of three upon the application for the preliminary injunction.

Fifth. Another feature of this matter occurs to me and, in view of the shortness of the time, may be of some practical importance. I presume that if your bill should be passed at this session it will be passed between now and the 1st of July, since on that date, I understand, the appropriation for the Commerce Court comes to an end. Consequently, the bill will pass both Houses and be approved by the President on very short notice. The result will be that apparently things will come to a dead stop in the Commerce Court on July 1. I have no cases there and am not advised as to the state of its docket, but I presume that it is probable that the court may have numerous cases in which it has heard arguments and received briefs, either on final submission or on submission upon some interlocutory motion.

The court under your bill will cease to have any jurisdiction immediately upon the approval of the bill, except as to the details relating to the transfer of the cases. Hence, the result may be that various district courts will have to take up and reconsider matters which have already been argued and submitted to the Commerce Court, and which, in the interest of economy of time and labor, could better be decided by the Commerce Court than to be reargued and reconsidered in the various district courts. What would you think, therefore, of the desirability of making a provision that the jurisdiction of the Commerce Court should continue for 30 days after the passage of the act for the purpose of disposing of all cases and motions under submission at the date of the passage of the act, all such cases to be transferred to their respective district courts at the end of the 30 days and all other cases in the Commerce Court to be transferred to the district courts at once? I do not regard the point as of paramount importance, but it occurs to me that it might be of substantial convenience to the Department of Commerce and the commission, as well as to the counsel of the railroad companies.

Sixth. There is one other feature of your bill which I ought to have mentioned in my previous letter, especially since that feature seems to be at variance with your intention of preserving the general law as it now is. The feature to which I refer is contained in lines 4 to 12, on page 4, and reads as follows:

"The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of preliminary injunctions and restraining or stay orders suspending the enforcement, operation, or execution of, or setting aside, orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. And in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case and upon the attorney general of the State."

Of course this is a matter with which the Commerce Court act does not deal at all and therefore constitutes entirely new legislation. Not only would the language quoted make an entirely new provision as to the cases in question, but it would be a provision which is substantially different from the existing provision contained in section 266 of the judiciary act (36 U. S. Stats. L., 1162), which relates to the granting of interlocutory injunctions suspending the enforcement of statutes of a State. Ought not the matter of issuing and granting of preliminary injunctions and restraining or stay orders suspending the enforcement of orders of State boards and commissions, if changed at all, to be made strictly analogous to the provisions relating to preliminary injunctions and restraining orders restraining the enforcement of State statutes?

I feel ashamed to have written you such a long letter, and feel that I am imposing on the consideration which you have shown me. Nevertheless, the subject is one of great importance, and I wish to make as clear as I can the points which have occurred to me. I shall be glad to render any further assistance in my power, although I am afraid I have been so prolix as to make me a discouraging correspondent.

Again expressing my great appreciation of the compliments you have shown me by conferring with me about this matter, I am

Sincerely, yours,

WALKER D. HINES.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I then carried these letters and suggestions of Mr. Hines and the three amendments I proposed to the Solicitor of the Interstate Commerce Commission and asked his opinion of so amending my bill 5611, and he said the three amendments proposed could not possibly hurt the bill, and he believed they would benefit it; and that is the reason why I advocated putting those three amendments in.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman from Tennessee tell me who brought this Mr. Hines or the Attorney General into this thing?

Mr. SIMS. All I know about Mr. Hines being in it was from the letter I received from the Attorney General commending his suggestions to my consideration.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, you never had anything to do with Mr. Hines in this matter until the Attorney General of the United States brought him to your attention?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I had heard of Mr. Hines, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. I mean you had never heard of him in connection with the Court of Commerce legislation?

Mr. SIMS. No; I had never heard of him in connection with the Commerce Court legislation. I do not even now know whether Mr. Hines is in favor of a Commerce Court or not. I did not ask him whether he was in favor of it or not, and I did not care whether he was or not. I was interested only in the manner of transferring jurisdiction of the Commerce Court to the district courts, and as the Attorney General has sent his letter to me with the respectful and kindly request to consider the suggestions therein, and at that time having no idea of insisting upon passing the bill 1921, I thought it was my duty, and nothing but a proper respect for the Attorney General, to submit the bill No. 5611 to Mr. Hines for his suggestions, and I did so. He gave them, as stated in his letters which I have just read. I see nothing wrong in my connection with the matter from beginning to end.

Mr. Speaker, this morning in a newspaper of this city there was an article published, stating in effect that a communication had been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary calling attention to this matter and making suggestions that perhaps the committee on lobbying of the Senate ought to investigate this matter and ask me for all correspondence in regard to it. I thoroughly agree with anything that looks to publicity about anything, and I give now and here to the public all the letters and communications of every kind about this whole affair, and I hope everybody will read them in the RECORD in the morning. There is nothing in this correspondence to indicate whether Mr. Hines is in favor of the Commerce Court or not, and it would not make a particle of difference to me whether he was or not, and I only asked his opinion and suggestions out of a proper respect for the Attorney General of the United States, who is the law officer of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have permission to place in the RECORD a copy of resolutions and bills which I have not had the time to read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the first is the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus:

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of this caucus that the Commerce Court be immediately abolished, during the present session, due care being taken at the same time to protect and provide for the jurisdiction now exercised by that court over pending and future litigation.

Second. The Committee on Rules is directed to bring into the House a rule making in order appropriate legislation for such purpose in any appropriation bill during the present session, whether incorporated in an original bill or by amendment, which amendment may be offered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in the House as in Committee of the Whole or in the House itself, and although such appropriation bill may be considered under motion to suspend the rules.

The next resolution was introduced by Hon. W. C. ADAMSON and referred to the Rules Committee, authorizing the abolishment of the court and vesting the jurisdiction now exercised by the Commerce Court in the district courts of the United States, which reads as follows:

Resolution.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this rule it shall be in order for the Committee on Appropriations to incorporate and report as a part of any appropriation bill, or for any Member, during the consideration of any appropriation bill, either in the House, although it may be on motion to suspend the rules, or in the House as in Committee of the Whole, or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to offer as an amendment to such appropriation bill the following provisions:

"That the Commerce Court, created and established by the act entitled 'An act to create a Commerce Court and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, and for other purposes,' approved June 18, 1910, be, and the same hereby is, abolished, and the jurisdiction vested in said Commerce Court by said act is hereby transferred to and vested in the several district courts of the United States: Provided, That the Commerce Court shall continue 60 days after the approval of this act for the purpose of considering, and so far as possible disposing of, cases already argued and submitted, but no new suit or case for any purpose shall be brought in said court.

"The venue of any suit hereafter brought to enforce, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in the judicial district where some or all of the transportation covered by the order has either its origin or destination, except that where the order does not relate to transportation the venue shall be in the district where the matter complained of in the petition before the commission arises, and except that where the order does not relate either to transportation or to a matter so complained of before the commission the matter covered by the order shall be deemed to arise in the district where one of the petitioners in court has either its principal office or its principal operating office. In case such transportation relates to a through shipment the term 'destination' shall be construed as meaning final destination of such shipment.

"The procedure in the district courts in respect to cases of which jurisdiction is conferred upon them by this act shall be the same as that heretofore prevailing in the Commerce Court. The orders, writs, and processes of the district courts may in these cases run, be served, and be returnable anywhere in the United States; and the right of appeal from the district courts in such cases shall be the same as the right of appeal heretofore prevailing under existing law from the Commerce Court. No preliminary injunction or restraining or stay order suspending the enforcement, operation, or execution of, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any order made or entered by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be issued or granted by any district court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any circuit judge acting as district judge, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a circuit or district judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a circuit judge, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. When such application as aforesaid is presented to a judge, he shall immediately call to his assistance to hear and determine the application two other judges. Said application shall not be heard or determined before at least five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Attorney General of the United States, and to such other persons as may be defendants in the suit. The hearing upon such application shall be given precedence, and shall be in every way expedited and be assigned for a hearing at the earliest practicable day after the expiration of the notice hereinbefore provided for. An appeal may be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting, after notice and hearing, a preliminary injunction, or restraining or stay order, in such case if such appeal be taken within 30 days after such preliminary injunction or restraining order or stay order is granted, and upon the final hearing of any suit brought to suspend or set aside, in whole or in part, any order of said commission the same requirement as to judges and the same procedure as to expedition and appeal shall apply. A final judgment or decree of the district court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States if appeal to the Supreme Court be taken by an aggrieved party within 60 days after the entry of such final judgment or decree, and such appeals may be taken in like manner as appeals are taken under existing law from the Commerce Court to the Supreme Court. The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of preliminary injunctions and restraining or stay orders suspending the enforcement, operation, or execution of, or setting aside, orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. And in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case and upon the attorney general of the State. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be deemed pending in and be transferred forthwith to said district courts, except cases which may previously have been submitted to that court for final decree. Each of said cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect; and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts.

"Any case hereafter remanded from the Supreme Court which but for the passage of this act would have been remanded to the Commerce Court shall be remanded to a district court designated by the Supreme Court wherein it might have been instituted at the time it was instituted in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and thereafter such district court shall take all necessary and proper proceedings in such case in accordance with law and such mandate, order, or decree therein as may be made by said Supreme Court.

"That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2272) providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913.

Be it enacted, etc., That after June 30, 1913, and until June 30, 1919, there shall be allowed at the Naval Academy 2 midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, 1 for Porto Rico, 2 for the District of Columbia, and 10 appointed each year at large: Provided, That midshipmen on graduation shall be commissioned ensigns in the Navy, or may be assigned by the Secretary of the Navy to fill vacancies in the lowest commissioned grades of the Marine Corps or Staff Corps of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asked to have a letter read.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I will ask that it be just inserted in the RECORD as read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution appropriating $4,000 to defray traveling expenses of soldiers of the Civil War, now residing in the District of Columbia, from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution appropriating $4,000 to defray traveling expenses of soldiers of the Civil War, now residing in the District of Columbia, from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 1917, the Indian appropriation bill, and ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report. The statement is short.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the accompanying statement will be read in lieu of the report.

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

[For full text of conference report and accompanying statement, see House proceedings of June 26, 1913, p. 2187.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an inquiry about some of these amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Which is the amendment that the gentleman desires to inquire about?

Mr. MANN. Amendment No. 11, proposing to have a joint commission, which I refer to respectfully as the joint commission to investigate Indian affairs, but if I referred to it without respect I should call it another congressional junketing committee.

I notice there are two of them provided for in this bill. The Committee on Indian Affairs are a great committee. Will they have the opportunity this summer to run two of these traveling committees?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that it is not the intention of making these committees junketing committees, but working committees.

Mr. MANN. That evidently is the intention. There is nothing else that can be done under this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman has overlooked the fact that the joint special committee to investigate the New Mexico sanitarium and the Yakima irrigation project must report before the 1st of January, 1914. The life of the other joint general Indian investigating committee runs during this Congress.

Mr. MANN. I have not overlooked that fact. That has nothing to do with the question I submitted, but I know that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The duties of these joint investigating committees are entirely different.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The first one is a special investigating committee to investigate the New Mexico and Yakima propositions only. That was carried in the original bill; if the gentleman will yield a moment——

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I am yielding for information.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think I can make it plain to the gentleman. That provision was for the purpose of investigating the $1,800,000——

Mr. MANN. That was to investigate the Yakima proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; the Yakima irrigation project and also the New Mexico Tuberculosis Sanitarium proposition was carried in the original bill——

Mr. MANN. It was not carried in the original bill as reported to the House at the last session, but was added as a Senate amendment or in conference.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was added last year in the Senate and agreed to in conference.

Mr. MANN. It was one of the Senate amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; and the House agreed to it, and it was a part of the bill. This bill contained that provision when it went to the Senate from the House. We made the latter part of the amendment for the purpose of investigating the question of appropriating $1,800,000 for the Yakima irrigation project. It is necessary to furnish to these Indians the water that they have had time out of mind for the purpose of irrigating part of their reservation.

The other proposition was to build a sanitarium for Indians suffering from tuberculosis, or the white plague, in the United States, and it was thought that New Mexico was the proper place to locate this sanitarium.

The Senate inserted the other proposition authorizing the joint commission of three members of each of the two Committees on Indian Affairs in this Congress to investigate every phase or proposition relative to the Indians named in the resolution.

The general investigating committee is required to report during the Sixty-third Congress. These are separate propositions, one a House, the other a Senate proposition. One is to investigate two special objects, and was provided for in the bill which was passed last winter. The other is a Senate proposition, for a general investigation of Indian matters.

Mr. MANN. What I said is still true, that there is a proposition in this bill now for two separate commissions to travel over the country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two investigations are necessary.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to explain the reason why?

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman had been doing that; but I am always willing to hear my instructive friend from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will yield, I think I have fully explained the first matter that I referred to.

With reference to the second, the Indian reservations are scattered all over the western part of the United States. It is impossible for our committee to legislate intelligently upon these matters when the Indians are so far away from us, and it is necessary to send a committee there to learn at first-hand their actual condition and desires.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. There are two commissions provided for by this conference report—one is for a commission of three Members of the House and three from the Senate, and the other is for a commission of two Members of the House and two from the Senate. I heartily concur in what the chairman has just stated, that the location of the Indians and the property being so far from Washington and so little known, intelligent legislation respectipg both the property and the Indians can not be had without some investigation. Does the gentleman think that the balance of the Indian committee is pure surplusage, and that the end can be obtained by having two commissions when the committee stands at 21?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not presume the same men would be put on the two commissions. One would investigate the two special purposes, and the other would be a general committee to extend during the life of the Congress. The Indians have $800,000,000 of property scattered all over the country, and to intelligently legislate on these matters we should have a general investigation by the two Houses jointly, investigating these Indian affairs and then reporting back to the House.

Mr. MILLER. What is the reason we investigate the need and maintenance of a tuberculosis hospital in New Mexico? I should think if there was any one subject that the committee could legislate upon without a personal investigation that would be the one. Why was that selected, instead of some of the large and insistent questions relating to irrigation of lands in Arizona, for instance, and the Blackfoot question in Montana?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indian population of New Mexico and Arizona located on the Navajo Reservation and the Mescalero and Apache Indians and various scattered bands elsewhere will amount to possibly 40,000 in numbers. It was not contemplated by the Senate amendment to build a sanitarium on the Rio Grande, but to build it in the White Mountains, on this side of the Rio Grande.

Let me state further that Fort Wingate, which is situated near the line between Arizona and New Mexico, was abandoned several years ago and is no longer in use by the Army. This property is worth at least one-half a million dollars. It was used by five companies of Cavalry. I think we could use this fort and the valuable military reservation on which it is located for this hospital and also for the purpose of locating thereon an Indian school. It is on the edge of the Navajo Reservation and near the center of a very large Indian population, where there is more need of a hospital than at any other point in these States.

Mr. MILLER. It is not contemplated for a general commission to go to New Mexico to secure information which the gentleman has given us and which seems ample?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; but I will further state that Fort Stanton, on the eastern side of the Rio Grande, has been used a number of years for the purpose of a sanitarium for the tuberculosis patients of the Navy. They have been successfully treated there and we have spent at least $250,000 on that hospital.

This fort, if abandoned, will make an excellent sanitarium. Which of these two forts or military reservations will be the best for the sanitarium is a question which Congress must settle. The Senate adopted the amendment of putting it in the White Mountains or Mescalero Reservation and starting a new sanitarium entirely. The amendment further proposes to build a road from the railroad to this point, but the House conferees objected to that Senate amendment because, as I have stated, we have half a million dollars' worth of abandoned property at the two forts I have named, and we should use these buildings and lands. Therefore your committee thought it was best to investigate the matter before we agreed to build a new sanitarium.

Mr. MILLER. I want to state that I have no objection or criticism upon securing information for the committee to enable it to transact its business intelligently. I think the Indian Committee needs all the information it can possibly get and never will get enough; but what I do emphasize strongly is that I think there has been selected two rather inconsequential and vague subjects on which to secure information when there are a large number of vitally important ones that could more properly engage the attention of the committee and of the investigators. For instance, it seems to me that the matter of irrigating Indian lands ought to receive a rigid and searching inquiry by a proper committee of this House, and probably by the Indian Committee, or by some members of it, and to pass that by and select these others seems to me rather inconsequential.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will read the report providing for the general committee, he will find that they have power to report all of these matters.

Mr. MILLER. If that is true, does the gentleman think that two or three members of the committee can possibly secure information to leaven the rest of the committee?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. If that is true, that the whole range of those subjects is to be investigated, does the gentleman think that two or three members going abroad and securing this information would be sufficient to leaven the whole 19 members who do not have the privilege of going? In other words, is the committee large enough to do any good?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think a joint committee of the two Houses would be better than a committee of one House?

Mr. MILLER. I do; but I think a joint committee of two or four on a subject of this magnitude is inadequate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There would be six, I believe, on the general committee, three on the part of the House and three on the part of the Senate, and four on the other, and it was the opinion of the conference committee that that would be sufficient.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MANN. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I did not intend to yield the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not take the floor. The Speaker was putting the question upon the conference report, and I did take the floor. If the gentleman has the time, I have no objection, but I supposed that I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Illinois did get possession of the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, of course, he has one hour.

Mr. MANN. I shall not unduly delay the consideration of the conference report. I am willing to yield it to the gentleman from Texas.

I wish to submit an observation or two concerning this bill. The Indian appropriation bill passed the House in the last Congress and passed the Senate in the last Congress with a lot of Senate amendments and went to conference. It was agreed upon in conference, and in the Senate the conference report was not agreed to because of some reason to which I shall not refer. The sentiment of the Senate was in favor of agreeing to the conference report as was the sentiment of the House. Undoubtedly if it had not been at so late a day in the session the conference report would have been agreed to.

At this session of Congress, it being customary to pass the appropriation bills for the next ensuing fiscal year at the short session of the last Congress, we generally agreed to repass the Indian appropriation bill as the conference committee had agreed to it in the last House. The minority made no objection. The bill was never read for amendment. It was never open for discussion except for 20 minutes, I believe, on a side, and good faith on the part of the Senate should have required the Senate not to add on a lot of Senate amendments. The House had already agreed in the form of its former conference report to a great many Senate amendments. The House and the Senate conferees had split their disagreements and brought in one conference report, and when the House at this session of Congress passed this Indian appropriation bill in the form of a conference report in the last House, the House was accepting a lot of Senate propositions that the House never favored by way of ordinary compromise which necessarily comes in conference. Thereupon the bill went to the Senate and with a hoggishness that ought to receive some criticism, the Senate took advantage of the situation to add on a lot of new Senate amendments and then insist that in conference again the House and Senate conferees should split their differences and agree to a part of the Senate amendments in compromise.

What have we now brought before the House? Though not first in order, there is amendment No. 51, providing for a junketing trip, that was carried in the House bill as it passed the House, although it was not a House proposition. That sends four distinguished gentlemen out to Washington at the expense of the Government. To visit Washington is a liberal education to any man, and it may be desirable for these gentlemen to go there and have a pleasant time, going up to Mount Tacoma, or some other place, enjoying themselves. And in order to insure that they have a long trip they have to make it by way of New Mexico.

Mr. MONDELL. And the Grand Canyon.

Mr. MANN. Going one way or the other. They go over the Canadian Pacific one way and come down over the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, I suppose, the other way—the longest possible way around. That is what they used to say when I was a boy when you went to see your girl, that the longest way around was the shortest way home. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment; I would like to complete the statement. Now, the Senate having secured that provision in the bill as it passed the House by way of compromise last session, they then proceeded to stick in another junketing trip. We have a House Committee on Indian Affairs. The Senate has a Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. We have a House Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. The Senate has a Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. These expenditures committees have a right to make a thorough investigation of everything in the department, and the House Committee on Expenditures has been attempting to make such an investigation into the Interior Department relating to Indians and other services. Now, what does this new junketing committee provide for?

> For the purpose of making thorough inquiry into the conditions in the Indian service, with a view to ascertaining any and all facts relating to the conduct and management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and of recommending such changes in the administration of Indian affairs as would promote the betterment of the service and the well-being of Indians, that there shall be constituted a commission, etc.

This is one of the duties of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House and of the Senate, and if the entire 21 members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House will conduct hearings on this subject they will know a great deal more than they will ever learn by appointing three members of the committee.

A committee of this House which desires to deal with the great problems before it ought to sit as a full committee and have hearings before the committee and not undertake to leave to three members as a subcommittee the question of determining into the conditions of the Indian service with a view of recommending changes in the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to my distinguished friend from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to advocate a committee of 21 Members of the House, the full committee of the House, to make this investigation?

Mr. MANN. I am advocating that a committee of 21 Members of the House make the investigation, sitting in its committee room here in Washington, where it ought to be made.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. So far as the second proposition of this amendment is concerned, could not some officer from the Interior Department be detailed to make this investigation and report the facts to the committee better than the committee of Congress sending out to do it?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not say they can make it better than a committee of Congress, but that is the business of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the Indian Office, that is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, that is what they have a large number of special employees for—to make recommendations to Congress to be passed upon by the full committee and then by the House itself.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, would not the work involved under this amendment be such that Members of Congress who go upon the committee would not be prepared to do, and that it could be better done by some person from the Indian Office who is skilled in this line of work?

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, without making any reflection whatever upon the intelligence and ability of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and there is no higher standing committee in intelligence and ability in the House than that committee, it is safe to say that they must rely largely upon the judgment of the men expert in the Office of Indian Affairs who deal with these questions constantly. This commission is directed—to examine into the conduct and management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and all its branches and agencies, their organization and administration. The commission shall have power and authority to examine all books, documents, and papers in the said Bureau of Indian Affairs, its branches or agencies, relating to the administration of the business of said bureau, and shall have power to subpœna witnesses, etc.

The Committee on Indian Affairs has practically all this power now. The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department has this power now. What is the object in appointing these gentlemen, who, I know, personally do not seek the appointment? With Congress in session until December at this special session, with a long session of Congress next summer running until August, and then with a political campaign coming on for reelection in November, there is not a great deal of time left for members of the committee to do this work unless they leave Washington while the House is in session.

In the last Congress it became the habit of a lot of the new committees as newly constituted to go away from Washington in order to conduct investigations. I do not believe that will become a habit in this House. I do not think we will permit it if we can avoid it, because many times in the last Congress where there was no quorum present it was largely because of many Members who were away from Washington on the theory that they were attending to public business, although that was not often the fact.

Mr. Speaker, following this amendment are amendments numbered 11½ and 11¾.

Mr. GARNER. Before the gentleman goes to that I would like to ask out of what fund and what amount of money is appropriated for this committee?

Mr. MANN. Twenty-five thousand dollars out of the Treasury. It was $50,000 in the Senate amendment, and the House conferees had it reduced to $25,000, although how they will spend that amount is beyond my knowledge. They ought to be able to make a good many trips for $25,000.

Now, here are amendments numbered 11½ and 11¾. I will give a prize to any Member of this body or any other legislative body who will inform me how a Senate amendment, coming from the Senate to the House, can get a number of 11½ or 11¾. Amendments are not numbered when they are agreed to. They are not numbered until they are sent from the Senate to the House. How do you manage to get an amendment numbered 11½ and another numbered 11¾?

And that brings me to the remark that I really wanted to make on this subject. We were told that the Democrats in the House who distributed the "pie" in the last Congress are now up against the proposition to redistribute the "pie" so as to take care of the new Members of Congress. I sympathize with the new Members of Congress on the subject. I do not blame them for wanting a portion of the patronage of the House if they can get it.

But I hope that the new Members on the Democratic side, as well as the old Members, will remember that efficiency in the House demands that some of the old employees of the House be retained. And one of the most efficient employees of this House to-day is the engrossing clerk of the House. He comes from a district which I believe is now represented by a Republican, and I suppose his sponsor, having failed of reelection, or anybody having failed to come as a Democrat from the district, that this capable employee, who prevents more errors than any other employee of the House, will get it "where the chicken got the ax." You do not care over there, in the main, for efficiency. This error was not made by a House employee. I do not know what Senate employee may have made it. They have a Democratic majority there, and some new men in the Senate, and it is possible that a new employee made the error.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. These are Senate amendments and numbered by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Senate does not number amendments, and neither does the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman happened to read the RECORD as to what was done with this bill in the Senate yesterday? It was twice withdrawn on account of errors.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the list of errors in connection with this bill and the Indian bill of the last session of Congress would fill nearly a volume. I called attention to them several times in the last Congress. Items were sent to the Senate in the Indian bill, as being in the bill, that were stricken out in the House. There were many and manifold errors. Those employees who have made good in the House should be kept. I was sorry when the present enrolling clerk was appointed, because he succeeded one of the best clerks that was ever around any legislative body. In following many of these bills through, I frequently have to obtain information from the enrolling clerk. I have found him to be a very intelligent and a very careful employee, and I am going to invite him to be a Republican when he gets fired by the Democrats of the House.

Now, as to amendment No. 35, I notice that the House conferees have reduced the amount of interest to be paid by the Government from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. Now, where we are obliged by treaty with the Indians to take money on deposit with the Government and pay interest at 4 or 5 per cent, I can see a reason for that; but why should we voluntarily take the money from the Indians on sale of property in this way and then pay a rate of interest far higher than the Government can obtain money for? And why do even more than that? You will probably deposit this money in the banks in Oklahoma at 2 per cent, and then the Government will pay the people of Oklahoma 4 per cent for money which they take as a favor to the people on deposit in their banks at 2 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a new provision providing for the payment of interest, or has interest been paid like this on some occasions heretofore?

Mr. MANN. This is a new provision.

Mr. GARNER. What has been the rate heretofore?

Mr. MANN. We have been paying 4 or 5 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is indicting his own administration.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The gentleman from Texas is in error.

Mr. GARNER. I was asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. Usually these treaty agreements follow an arrangement which has been made with an Indian tribe with reference to the sale of property.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The proceeds of all of these lands drew 4 per cent, and that is the reason why we have changed it from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. There was a reservation which was sold where the proceeds drew 5 per cent.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman will find any treaty that provides that these lands shall be sold by the Government, and that all over $1.25 an acre shall be deposited with the Government at 4 per cent or any other rate of interest. Where we are not required to by any obligation, I do not see why we should be obliged to pay 4 per cent interest on money which we turn around and deposit in Oklahoma banks at 2 per cent. Perhaps we do not get that much.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is in the control of the Secretary of the Interior. That money is in his charge, and he is authorized to deposit it.

Mr. MANN. That is not under the control of the Secretary of the Interior except as we pass legislation providing for it. It is only under his control as he is required to do it by legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy any more time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 32, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill by its title, as follows:

An act (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 32.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CLAYTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks for a division. Those in favor of the motion will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty Members have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eleven gentlemen have arisen in the negative.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 50 and the noes are 11, and——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. You can not do that.

The SPEAKER. There is an automatic call.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I can get it, an automatic call will suit me just as well as any other.

Mr. MANN. You can not get a quorum to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for a division. Those in favor of the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Nineteen gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-three gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 19 and the noes are 53.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. We may just as well have the yeas and nays on this motion as on any other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Sixteen in the affirmative.

Mr. CLAYTON. The other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the other side. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-one. Sixteen are sufficient. The yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 26, nays 150, answered "present" 4, not voting 249, as follows:

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now call the roll on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 32.

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The roll just having been called on a motion to adjourn, which developed the fact that no quorum is present, is there anything else in order except the call of the House?

The SPEAKER. That is just what this is, an automatic call of the House. Those in favor of going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will, when their names are called, answer "yes," and those opposed will answer "no," and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 166, nays 12, answered "present" 5, not voting 245, as follows:

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have come to the closing day of this week with a record left behind us not only in the history of this great Nation but as it enters into the individual life of the citizenship of the Nation, a record which Thy servants in the Senate must also meet at the final judgment.

We pray Thee to forgive all Thou hast seen wrong, correct all mistakes that we have made, and overrule all human blunders. Give to us as never before a willingness to follow the divine guidance in the discharge of every duty and a supreme passion to bring about the accomplishment of Thy will in this great land. And as we face the coming day with its holy memories and its sacred associations, give us the spirit of God on the Lord's day that we may learn better than ever before what is the will of God, and have the grace to follow it. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to both sides of the House, next week being the week in which the Fourth of July occurs, and many Members of the House desiring to be away at that time, I desire to make an agreement respecting the adjournment of the House for three days at a time. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. GLASS] that that committee will not be able to report a bill from the committee for at least two weeks. I know of no other important business to come before the House. If it is agreeable to both sides of the House, I would like to enter into a pact that we may adjourn for three days at a time, and transact no business when the House meets except the small business that can be done by unanimous consent, until Monday, July 14.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if it would be practicable for the House to take a recess until that time by the passage of a concurrent resolution, and whether or not that has been contemplated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is necessary. Of course we could do that. There is nothing that we can do between now and the 14th of July, and if we can not enter this understanding, we will undoubtedly come here and adjourn the House for three days at a time. The majority is here. The only reason I ask to make this agreement is that the membership of the House may not be required to stay here.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand the gentleman's statement about the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman yielded to me, and I have not yet got through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota has the floor, the gentleman from Alabama having yielded.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the proposition is that until the 14th of July there is to be an understanding that no business is to be transacted, and that the House will adjourn for three days at a time, as has been done on two other occasions?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my proposition is merely to continue the system that we have had for two weeks or more. Let the understanding be that if there are some small matters, such as sending a bill to conference or something that may be done by unanimous consent, that that can be done, without a quorum being present, and that we will do business only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will say that on yesterday I was told in the Senate that it was contemplated that there would be a concurrent resolution for an adjournment of the House until July 14, and I understood from a conversation with the majority leader last evening that that was in contemplation. I wired to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is out of the city, that that was contemplated, and I received a reply that it met with his approval. Now, if the gentleman thinks that is not practical and that the same result can be accomplished by this understanding, which I believe is termed a "gentlemen's agreement," there will be no objection on this side of the House, so far as the Republicans are concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota he misunderstood me if he referred to me as the majority leader, if he is referring to this side of the House. I did not intend to leave the impression on the gentleman's mind that we intended to pass any concurrent resolution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, I do not think it is very material which way it is done; I would prefer it to be done that way, and then there would be an understanding there would be no session of the House until that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman understands the arrangement we made several weeks ago——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; and that was very satisfactory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And my purpose is if we can agree we can make the same arrangement for two weeks—that is, up until Monday, the 14th day of July.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit a question now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman from Alabama talked to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the day on which he will bring in his deficiency bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did talk with the gentleman from New York. Of course there is nothing in this arrangement that will prevent the gentleman from New York passing a deficiency bill if it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but there are very important matters covered in that deficiency bill, and in the conversation with the gentleman from New York yesterday, he was very anxious, at as early a date as possible, as soon as he can get through with the hearings, to pass that bill. Now, we want to stay here and pass that bill when it is necessary and not wait for unanimous consent to do it, in order that we may have sufficient money to run the Government, before we understand there is to be an agreement to adjourn over for two weeks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my understanding with the gentleman from New York was that he had no objection to this agreement. But I do not care to make it. I was only making the request for the convenience of the House, and I will give notice that the House will adjourn three days at a time until we have business to transact——

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not quite understand the gentleman's explanation about the program on banking and currency. I wish the gentleman would repeat that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know anything about the program on banking and currency except I asked the gentleman from Virginia whether he would be able to report a bill to the House before the 14th day of July, and he said they would not. That is all I know about it.

Mr. MURDOCK. And then after we reconvene on July 14 there is a probability we shall go on with general debate on the currency?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not know, I can not tell the gentleman; I am not informed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman inform us as to the progress of the tariff bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not; the gentleman knows as much about it as I do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there any likelihood of the tariff being ready for report and action and debate in the Senate before July 14?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no information whatever. Mr. Speaker, as there seems to be some objection, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama, if he will permit, that it is entirely agreeable to me to have a concurrent resolution to adjourn over until that time, but if he does not want it——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, I do not think there is any reason why this House should interfere with the action of the Senate——

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I hope the gentleman will make provision that nothing but unanimous consents shall come up until July 14.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I withdraw my request.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Alabama assure us that no business of importance will be transacted until that time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can; but I say, as I see there is objection——

Mr. MURDOCK. There is no objection on my part.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, there are some gentlemen on this side.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, well——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws the request, and that is the end of that matter.

The SPEAKER. There is a note appended to the message saying that the documents in the case went to the Senate with a copy of the message.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1917. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

BUSINESS PROSPERITY.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Vincennes Daily Sun of June 26, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial from the Vincennes Sun of June 26, 1913. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the editorial referred to:

"O YOU PROSPERITY.

"It is almost universally conceded by the press and by representatives of large business interests that there is strong promise of a season of unusual activity and prosperity in business. This situation right in the very teeth, you might say, of the most radical tariff reductions and currency reform ever proposed by any President or Congress is in the nature of a miracle. It can not be accounted for save on the single hypothesis that the people and the legitimate business interests have faith in the integrity of the administration man and his purposes. There is scarcely to be found a newspaper of high or low estate, nor a leader of prominence or influence in any party, but that is either by his silence acquiescing or is outspoken in conceding honesty and ability to President Wilson and his administration counselors.

"When we consider that either adversity or prosperity is so largely in the thought, and when we find the whole thought of the business world and of the country imbued with the idea that prosperity is due and imminent, we can rest assured that the country is safe."

THE TARIFF.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by embodying as a part of those remarks an article prepared by the National Grange legislative committee on the subject of the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the article referred to:

THE GRANGE AND THE TARIFF.

To the honorable Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

The legislative committee of the National Grange, representing the hundreds of thousands of farmer members of that great conservative fraternity, recognize the fact that the responsibility of legislating for the hundred million citizens of this country is upon you, and that the temper of that citizenship is to exact an accounting of your legislative stewardship. The Grange does not expect its legislative committee to be lobbyists in any sense, but as plain farmers to present to our national Congress in a fair and reasonable way the views of the Grange and the farmers it represents, upon matters of national legislation as they come up for enactment or amendment.

Just at this time the whole country is interested in the tariff law now in process of enactment by Congress. Any substantial modification of the existing tariff laws must affect the interests of all our people more or less seriously, and, as a rule, men will indorse or condemn any proposed change as it may, or as they think it may, affect their personal interests favorably or unfavorably. Statesmen will rise above local or personal considerations and seek the greatest good to the greatest number or the greatest good to the whole country. For more than 40 years the Grange has stood upon the broad platform that "we seek the greatest good to the greatest number," and it further declares that "we desire a proper equality, equity, and fairness; protection for the weak; restraint upon the strong; in short, justly distributed burdens and justly distributed power."

It is only fair to those who agree with us, as well as those who do not agree with us, that we present to you the position of the Grange upon the tariff question, which is now so acutely before the American people. In one form and another the Grange has for many years repeatedly taken the broad position that so long as protection is the policy of the Government, that agriculture is entitled to a full share of protection.

At the forty-third session of the National Grange in November, 1909, it specifically said: "That whatever the policy of the Government may be, the farmers of the United States demand that so far as possible such measure of direct benefit therefrom as is given to manufacturers or any other industry of the country shall also be accorded to agriculture."

At the annual meeting of the National Grange in 1910, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Wherens the National Grange at its forty-third annual session condemned the tariff law of 1909 as unjust to the farmers of the country, and in no sense in accord with the promises of tariff revision made by the party responsible for its enactment: Therefore

"Resolved, That the National Grange urges that in any future revision of our tariff laws the duties upon any article should never exceed the difference between the labor cost of producing such article in this country and in foreign countries, and

"Resolved, That we favor the immediate amendment of the present tariff act so as to reduce the excessive protection now given to many staple manufactured articles, the production of which is controlled by trusts and monopoly combinations, and

"Resolved, That we urge a material reduction of the duties on all articles which are sold by our manufacturers in foreign markets at lower prices than those charged to the people of this country."

Similar resolutions were adopted in 1911, and at the annual session held at Spokane, Wash., November, 1912, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "We believe that the tariff should be so regulated that it shall not cover more than the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and if we are to have free trade for one, we should have free trade for all. And further, that when the manufacture or sale of any article becomes monopolized, that the tariff be removed from such article."

There is no misunderstanding the position of the National Grange upon the tariff question. The Grange has not undertaken to say whether protection, tariff for revenue, or free trade is the best policy for this Government, and being a nonpartisan organization, its members belong to all political parties and, of course, have different views upon economic questions, but there is practically unanimous agreement that whatever the policy of the Government may be, that the farmers should receive a horizontal rate of protection with the manufacturer, or in other words, "Tariff for all or tariff for none."

As Past Master Rhone, of Pennsylvania State Grange, has said, "When the people at the ballot box decide any issue raised by the political parties on general principles, our order cheerfully accepts the situation and only insists that the policy thus indorsed shall be fairly carried into effect without any discrimination against the farmer. In the change of the political situation of our country our farmers had reason to believe that in the revision of the tariff, placing it on a new basis, that it would be so adjusted that duties would be imposed largely on luxuries and such products as might be imported that would directly come in competition with American agriculture productions and American manufactures, which are essential to give employment to American labor and capital. In fact this was guaranteed in the platform of the party in power."

We frankly admit that the difficulty that Congress must find in so radical a revision of our tariff laws as is now proposed, and with every possible concession to a spirit of fairness and equity, and in compliance with Grange principles, we find ourselves compelled to object to some of the changes proposed in the agricultural schedule of the bill which has passed the House and is now being considered by the Senate, especially the proposition to place agricultural products on the free list as "raw material." All products as they leave the farm are the "finished products" of the farmer, as much as are the output of the factories the finished products of the manufacturer, and any and every protection or advantage that is accorded to one should be accorded the other. If we are to have free raw sugar, then free refined sugar; if free wool, then free woolens. The proposition to put wool on the free list while a tariff is continued on the goods made from wool is unfair as between the farmer and the manufacturer.

It is manifestly inexpedient for us to take up the tariff schedule in detail in this communication, but we desire to present as forcefully as possible the views of the farmers of the country and to assure you that they are wide-awake and studying economic problems as never before. They have no means or time to spend as lobbyists, but they are learning how to use the ballot. The farmers of the country are not opposed to a downward revision of the tariff and they know the difference between "downward" and "upward," and they insist upon not being discriminated against in the letting down of the bars.

All history proves that agriculture is the basis of national prosperity, and the broadest, deepest, and most fundamental problem before the American people to-day is the insurance of agricultural progress, prosperity, and development. We should not lose sight of the fact that agriculture can not be made prosperous by talk alone.

Frankly and respectfully we have presented for your consideration the attitude of the Grange upon the subject of tariff revision, and we venture to express the hope that Congress will do nothing that will unfairly discriminate against the agricultural interests of the country.

Respectfully submitted.

OLIVER WILSON,
T. C. ATKESON,
N. P. HULL,
Legislative Committee National Grange.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was called.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT NEWARK, N. J.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6383.

The SPEAKER. On what calendar is the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. On the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It can not be called up until we get through with this call.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am asking unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 6383) to amend section 19 of an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman modify his request so that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would tell us something about this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in the last public buildings bill there was an item providing for the sale of the Government building at Newark, N. J. The act, in brief, stipulated that the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to sell the property for not less than $1,800,000, and he was further authorized to use not more than $800,000 in the purchase of a new site, and the balance of the proceeds arising from the sale were to be used in the construction of a new building in that city. It did not take one cent out of the Public Treasury. But the law officers of the Treasury Department, in construing the section, held that while the act did give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to sell the property, and gave him the authority to invest not exceeding $800,000 in a new site, the language, in their judgment, was not sufficient to empower the Secretary to use the remainder of the proceeds arising from the sale in the construction of a new building. This is a bill introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] to correct that.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I have already stated about this bill. The last public buildings bill carried a section with reference to the public building at Newark, N. J. That provision, in brief, was that the Secretary of the Treasury was given the power to sell the Government property in the city of Newark for a price not less than $1,800,000. The Secretary of the Treasury was further given the power to buy a new site, using the proceeds of the sale of the property, at a price not to exceed $800,000.

The committee sought, and the Congress sought, in the passage of the bill to give the Secretary the further power to use all of the remainder of the proceeds in the construction of a new building. The act did not seek to appropriate one dollar from the Treasury of the United States. The law officers of the Treasury Department, in construing this section, held that the act did give the Secretary the power to sell the property; that it did give him the power to invest not exceeding $800,000 of the proceeds in the purchase of a new site; but that, in their judgment, it did not give the Secretary the right to use the remainder of the proceeds of the sale in the construction of a new building.

Now, this bill has been introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY], in whose district Newark is located, in order to correct that defect. It does not appropriate a single cent. Not one dollar is carried by the bill, except as to the proceeds arising from the sale of the property.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that, referring to the report, it provides that the purposes of the bill are twofold.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. Perhaps I overlooked that. There is one other provision in it. On account of the fact that the Supervising Architect's Office is so far behind in its work, and on account of the fact that the Government will be forced to occupy and to use this property until the new building shall have been constructed and is ready for occupancy, it was felt that the purchaser necessarily would take that into consideration, and that the purchase price necessarily would be very much lower on that account; and therefore, in order to get more for the property than could be had otherwise, there is a provision in this amendatory act giving the Secretary the authority to employ some outside architects. But the bill does not tax the Treasury with a cent.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a short statement?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the provision for the employment of special architects' services, I should like to call attention to this particular situation in reference to the section of the public-buildings bill which we seek to amend. We are limited to getting $1,800,000 for our present site. We are limited in the bill, so that we can not pay rent to a purchaser for the present site. Consequently we have got to remain in possession and occupation of our present site until a new building is completed and until we are ready to occupy it.

The bill also provides that the new site and the new building must be paid for out of the proceeds of the sale of the present site. Consequently the Treasury Department will be obliged to make a contract with a would-be purchaser by which the purchaser can not get possession of the property until the new building is completed, but in the meanwhile he has got to make payments on the purchase price, and probably the largest payment he will have to make will be the one in the beginning, with which we are to buy the site, and on which we are limited to $800,000.

Consequently, what the purchaser will have to do when he is figuring how much he can bid is to say, "This property, in my opinion, is worth so much, but I can not get possession of it until three or four or five years, whatever the time may be. I have got to pay my money in advance of possession, and consequently I have got to discount all these payments and estimate interest on each payment from the time I make it up to the time I get possession of the property," and he makes that as a discount.

Now, if we can not use a part of the proceeds of the sale of this building to pay for special architects' services the result will be that we shall have to wait five years before the building can be completed, and, being limited to getting $1,800,000 for our property, the chances are that the discount that the purchaser will have to make will be so large that he can not afford to pay $1,800,000 for the property, and the result is that we can not go ahead at all, because unless we get that we can not go ahead with any part of the proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. What assurance is there that the hiring of additional architects will expedite the building over there?

Mr. McCOY. I am assured by the Supervising Architect that if we can make use of some of this money which we get from the sale of the building we can get some of these architects to help in the preparation of the plans. Now, the result of it will not be that any other project will be set back.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not? That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. McCOY. Because we are simply using our own money that we get from the sale of this building, and the reason we are so far behind in the regular course of building operations is because the Supervising Architect is limited in what he can spend, and consequently he has to take up a few projects at a time because of the lack of money to do more. But here the money will come, not out of the appropriation for architects' services, but out of the proceeds of the sale of this building.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that perfectly, but I do not see how it is possible for the gentleman's project to be advanced without delaying some other project.

Mr. McCOY. I am assured by the Supervising Architect that that will not happen, because, as I say, the reason why he is behind is merely because he has not sufficient money with which to go ahead more rapidly. Now we are not taking any of the money appropriated for the Supervising Architect's Office at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. If this bill does not pass this morning, and provision is not made for additional architectural help, then the gentleman's project will occupy a certain place in the list. If, however, the bill does pass the House and passes the Senate and is signed by the President, then the gentleman's project will be expedited. I say, how is it possible to expedite it without delaying some other gentleman's project?

Mr. McCOY. For the reason that all projects are now delayed merely because there is not a sufficient appropriation to hire the requisite number of architects.

Mr. ADAMSON. Outside architects.

Mr. McCOY. Now, we are not going to take any money from the appropriations made for the architectural force of the Supervising Architect's Office, but we are going to take money which will be the proceeds of the sale of this property, to employ additional or outside architects, and the other projects, as well as our own, will probably be expedited instead of being put behind.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know whether the plans for his building have been approved?

Mr. McCOY. I do know that they have not been.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know what the building is going to cost?

Mr. McCOY. We are limited by the bill to expending the amount which we get for the property in excess of what it costs for the site.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unfortunately that does not limit the cost of the building, as Congress has so often found. What I am trying to get at is, if the gentleman knows whether there has been worked out any plan by which the actual cost of this building that is to be erected has been determined.

Mr. McCOY. No; no plan has been worked out at all, because the moment the Attorney General construed the act as he did the whole matter was held up; and I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the committee amended my bill so as to provide specifically that the limit of cost should be the balance of the proceeds after the purchase of the lot. Now, they could not tell how much that would be. There are several offers of property, running all the way from $300,000 to $800,000, for the site. They could not name a definite sum, because nobody knows which one of these sites will be selected.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does know, presumably, the capacity of the building that will be required for the public service there.

Mr. McCOY. I am assured by the architect's office that if we can get one of these sites there will be ample money to provide a building that will be sufficient for the post office, the courts, the internal-revenue collector, and the deputy customs collector.

Mr. SHERLEY. What proportion of the moneys realized from the sale of the present property does the gentleman contemplate will be expended in architect's fees? Is there any limitation?

Mr. McCOY. Yes; the limitation is not to exceed 5 per cent of the cost of the building. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill.

Mr. McCOY. That amendment was also suggested by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and was incorporated into the bill.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. This seems to be a complicated question, and I wanted to see if I understood how they propose to do. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the new building is to be erected on the site of the old building, and that the old building is to be used until the new building is completed?

Mr. McCOY. No; I hope the gentleman from Connecticut did not understand me to say that.

The SPEAKER. While there is no gentleman speaking, the Chair will request all Members who do speak to speak so that Members can hear. The semiprivate conversations that are carried on simply lead other Members to go on talking wherever they are.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. What provision has been made for the payment of rent that will be expended for the buildings required during the construction of the new building, and can any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the old building be used to pay rent?

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely none. We remain in occupation of the old building, and can not deliver title to it until the completion of the new building.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then how do you propose to sell the building and use the proceeds in the construction of a new building when you are in possession?

Mr. McCOY. The contract will have to provide for the delivery of the deed of the property when we have completed the new building. That is one of the hard things we are up against, and it creates a difficult situation; we are struggling under adverse circumstances.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. After the building is sold when is the purchase price to be paid?

Mr. McCOY. According to the tentative contract which was drawn by the Supervising Architect, it calls for enough to pay for the site, and I think three or six months after the advertising of the buildings, and the balance is to be paid in installments as the new building progresses. They are forced to make that arrangement, because we are obliged by the bill itself to pay for the new building out of the proceeds of the property. It is a most difficult situation and has to be handled with great care.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, the post-office building at Newark, N. J., is the most congested public building in the United States. It was constructed 16 years ago, when the Government had 181 officials in the postal service at that place. It has now over 420 officials occupying that same space. The population, on the construction of this building served by the postal officials, was 225,000. It has grown now to over 440,000. The postal receipts of Newark 16 years ago were $342,000 and in 1912 $1,240,000, an increase of $898,000. They pay into the Treasury as a surplus, after meeting all the necessary expenses in conducting the postal service, over $400,000. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the last House visited Newark—went through this office while the officials were at work. It would be inhuman and cruel for this Congress not to relieve the situation, much less continue it five or six years longer.

Now, this appropriation or money does not come out of the public Treasury. The Government paid $60,000 for the site 16 years ago, and we have expended on the building and site about $400,000. We will get for the present site and building, under the operation of this bill, not less than $1,800,000, which enables us to buy a new site satisfactory to the patrons of the office for not more than a sum exceeding $800,000, which will leave a balance of $1,000,000 for the construction of a building that will be large enough and adequate for the public service for a quarter of a century to come.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I realize the pressing need for post-office facilities at Newark. I have personally made an examination. I wish the gentleman would explain to the House how you are going to sell the property for the Government and how the money coming from the sale is to be put back in the construction of another building. When is the purchaser of this Government property to pay for the purchase and what becomes of the money?

Mr. AUSTIN. The transfer of the building to the contemplated purchaser at the earliest possible date means the largest amount of money to the Government. Unless the relief is granted the Government will lose perhaps $200,000 in the sale of this property, because it will be unable to substitute a new building under the present conditions in the Supervising Architect's Office for at least five or six years. With the present force in that office we are now turning out 90 plans per annum. With the passage of the recent omnibus public-building bill, with the present force in the Supervising Architect's Office, it will be six years before this plan and this building will be ready for a bid.

Mr. MURDOCK. Right there, as a matter of fact, there is nothing to prevent the purchase of a new site now is there?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; but there is something in the bill, as interpreted by the law officer of the Government, to prevent the Treasury Department from utilizing the balance of this money to proceed with the construction of a building upon a new site.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Government, then, would lose nothing in the purchase of a site?

Mr. AUSTIN. It would unless this bill is passed.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will say right there to the gentleman from Kansas that there is this: We have to collect the money for this old site as we go along with the new operation.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I was trying to get out of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McCOY. That is to be a part of the contract, because we are limited, in paying for a new site and building, to the expenditure of the money we get from the sale of this site and building. We can not do anything else.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let me ask right there, is there any money at all available for the construction of a new building?

Mr. McCOY. Not a cent until we get it out of this property.

Mr. MURDOCK. Or for the acquisition of this site?

Mr. McCOY. Not until we get it out of this property.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, you must first sell the old site before you can begin?

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it contemplated in selling the old site to have a total cash payment for this site at the beginning of the construction?

Mr. McCOY. We have to draw the contract so as to provide that the first payment shall at least equal the amount which we have to pay for the new site, because we can not pay for the new site except out of the money which is paid for the present site.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is perfectly clear to me. Then, subsequent payments are to go to the construction of the building?

Mr. McCOY. That will be paid as in the experience of the Supervising Architect's Office the contractors should get their money on the new building. They had the contract prepared, which provided for payments every three months, I believe, and that was specified because they would make payments to the contractors every three months. They would first get it from the purchaser of this site, and then turn it over to the contractors.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman why this arrangement was made rather than the ordinary one of purchasing a new site and the construction of a building?

Mr. McCOY. I will state to the gentleman that I introduced a bill in the Sixty-second Congress asking for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for a new site, but the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, after visiting Newark and seeing the situation, seeing that our present site was too valuable for the purposes for which it was being used; that the land is the only thing which is of any value, from a commercial point of view, and that the building was inadequate; that they could not acquire additional property in the immediate neighborhood except at exorbitant prices, and could not remodel the new building except at an exorbitant price, at its own volition adopted this plan.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman right there?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I notice that this whole bill is drawn upon the theory of getting the entire cost of the new building out of the price received for the old building.

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. While that is its intent, it does not anywhere near accomplish that purpose, because it does not provide for the payment for furnishings, which are a very large part of the cost incident to a new building, and which in the case of some public buildings have amounted, in my opinion, to a public scandal. I think the amount of money that was expended for furnishing the New York customhouse was in every way extravagant and indefensible. And my criticism of this particular bill as presented is that it does not carry in the first instance a requirement on the part of the Treasury Department that they shall have worked out plans showing the ultimate cost, including everything. The trouble is that what happens is just what happened at Boston, for instance. The department undertakes a certain type of building on the condition that it is going to cost a certain amount of money. They go far enough into it to realize that it can not be built for that amount of money, and also far enough into it to force the Government to give an additional amount. Then they come back here with a requirement that we add to the total cost of the building, and I think, if the gentleman will permit, that the bill ought to carry with it a provision requiring the working out of an exact plan, and that ought not to be difficult, knowing the floor space that is needed, and to include in the cost the entire furnishings, and that no building should be contracted for that could not be built and furnished within the price received from the sale of the old building.

Mr. McCOY. I hope the gentleman will not press that point, because we are now close to the limit of what an appropriate building with its ordinary equipment ought to cost under this limitation as it is on us now.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman says that we are close to the limit, and yet the gentleman a few moments ago, in answer to an inquiry of mine, said there had been no estimate as to the actual cost, but it would probably be within a certain amount. How does the gentleman know it is close to the limit?

Mr. McCOY. I have looked through the list of appropriations that have been made in cities of similar size to the city of Newark, and I think perhaps in only one instance has there been less appropriated than the proceeds of the sale of this property will amount to, and in all the other instances the amount appropriated has been very largely in excess of what we shall use here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit, that may be true, and it may be that we ought to appropriate not simply the moneys to be received from the sale of this building, to wit, $1,800,000, but we ought to appropriate $2,000,000 or $2,500,000. About that I express no opinion, because I have none, and I know the tremendous growth of the city of Newark; but this I do express as an opinion: That Congress ought to know, and the department ought to furnish Congress with the information so that it can know, what an appropriate building will cost before we enter upon the construction of one, whether we are getting the money out of the Treasury or out of the sale of old property or not, and because it does not do so makes the vice of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. McCOY. Well, I can only say to the gentleman from Kentucky this: That the Supervising Architect's office has stated to me—the Supervising Architect himself has stated to me—that if we can go ahead under this bill that there is no question but there will be an entirely——

Mr. SHERLEY. Then why does the gentleman make the statement that he has that he could not include the furnishing? Does the gentleman know how much the furnishing of such a building will cost?

Mr. McCOY. No; I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think the House ought to know that?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to say the gentleman from Kentucky will not find a single public-building bill that ever came into this House that arranged for the furnishing of the public building.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true; and that is one reason I have so much complaint of the methods by which we have appropriated moneys for public buildings in the past.

Mr. McCOY. I hope that I have convinced the gentleman from Kentucky that we are all laboring under sufficiently severe conditions, not asked for by ourselves but placed upon us by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to request him not to press that point, the merit of which I can see perfectly well. But this is not an extravagant proposition, and unless we can contract with an ordinary free hand along the line suggested by this amendment we might just as well give up the whole thing, because we can not get enough money to go ahead with. Now, if we can not get this through promptly and just as I have stated there will have to be discounts made by the purchaser in determining what he can afford to pay for this building that may bring us down below this $1,800,000. It was suggested in the committee when we had the hearings that we put the limit at $1,500,000. They asked us whether we should be willing to have the bill conditioned upon the limit of $1,500,000 as the minimum price for this old site, and we said yes; but when the bill came out of the committee the limitation was $1,800,000, because one of the members of the committee—in fact, several of the members of the committee—went there and went over the ground and made a special investigation in regard to the matter and were satisfied that the present site was worth about $2,200,000, as I recollect.

Now, if it is worth that, then as the matter stands to-day the chances are a purchaser can not give the full $1,800,000 for the property under the conditions imposed at present.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not meet my contention at all. I have no objection to his arrangement, and I grant the need of it, and the wisdom of it, by which you can sell the property so as not to have to discount from the purchase price the rent. But I think that Congress ought to know—and I think this is a very apt illustration of failure in the past—not by a general statement that we can build within a certain amount, but by the plans themselves, showing what the cost of a building is going to be and what it is going to cost to furnish it. I speak with some knowledge as a member of the committee which carries the appropriation for these bills, that repeatedly case after case has happened where the Government has been committed by physical building, as, for instance, in the Boston case, by an expenditure as to foundation, and we got to a point where we could not go back.

Now, I am willing to appropriate $2,500,000 if it is needed, but I do not want to appropriate a cent on a guess.

Mr. McCOY. I ask the gentleman not to endeavor to create a precedent in the handling of public-building bills in a case of this kind, where we are furnishing the funds and where I have been assured, as I stated, that they will be amply sufficient for what is contained in the bill. I have not the slightest notion what it will cost to furnish the building. I hope the Secretary of the Treasury, when the time comes, will not only have the good judgment in the interests of the public, but that he will also have the good taste to put in simple furniture, which is the only kind that ought to go in a public building. And if my constituents have the good judgment to send me back here I will cooperate with the Secretary of the Treasury in procuring only what is absolutely needed of the simplest, plainest, and least expensive kind compatible with good quality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In the last Congress the question of recognizing Members to call up bills by unanimous consent was discussed on several occasions. On the 7th of December, 1911, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made the statement that he should object to the consideration of any bill being called up by unanimous consent on any day other than Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and called attention to the change in the rules which provides for a Unanimous Consent Calendar. On a subsequent occasion, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, and the Speaker stated that under the rules it was not in order to ask for unanimous consent to call up a bill on a day other than the day when bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar were in order. This bill is upon the Union Calendar, and I think the debate has demonstrated that it is a bill of considerable importance. Therefore I would like to ask the Speaker, if it is in order, to submit a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has tried to explain the rule and practice two or three times. My own opinion is that when that Unanimous Consent Calendar was instituted, it was the intention of the House to confine unanimous consent to that calendar, and the Chair has adhered to that except where there was a matter of pressing emergency, to which there could be no reasonable amount of objection. Now, one day toward the end of the last session there were gentlemen who had four or five bills and resolutions which, if they were not passed before Congress adjourned, would be the cause of the Government losing money by the deterioration of the works that were going on. So late one evening when the House convened, the Chair let in four or five of those small matters, and finally the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] intervened and wanted to know if we were going to return to the old, bad system, and made some very vigorous remarks. The Chair announced that there was no intention of returning to the "old bad system," as the gentleman termed it, but that these matters were matters of pressing importance. Now, this matter has been explained to the Chair as being in this situation—that if it is not attended to promptly the work of building the public building in that town would be very much obstructed and delayed, and so forth. If anybody wants to object, he has the right to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] objects.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 103. Appropriating $4,000 to defray traveling expenses of soldiers of the Civil War now residing in the District of Columbia from Washington, D. C., to Gettysburg, Pa., and return.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have talked with gentlemen on this side who previously indicated some objection to the pact that I was trying to arrange a while ago and they now seem to be satisfied, and I therefore want to renew the proposition I made a while ago, that we enter into a pact on both sides of the House to the effect that there will be no business done after to-day until Monday, the 14th day of July, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, is it the gentleman's intention to adjourn every three days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; if that is agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the proposition of the gentleman is substantially what was entered into on a former occasion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to a recent interview published in the Washington press with Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will not the gentleman allow that to go by until I can get this matter settled?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is right in connection with that matter. In that interview the Senator is reported as saying that he and certain of his colleagues in the Senate intended to oppose and obstruct the passage of the currency bill up to the December session unless it was amended. Now, if we are to remain here until December, I submit to the majority of this House the question, Why not let us go forward with the work of Congress and get the committees busy and let us transact public business, and so relieve the regular session of Congress, convening in December, of a great deal of work and permit us to get away early next spring or summer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the statement of one Senator does not determine the policy of the Senate or of the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman knows that under the rules of the Senate a single Senator can prevent a final vote and the final consideration of any measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that we are not responsible for what may be transacted at the other end of the Capitol, and we shall take care of the situation here as it develops.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BURNETT. From the statement made by my colleague, Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is no probability of a currency bill being reported for two or three weeks, and yet those of us who live some distance away from Washington, unless some arrangement should be entered into, can not have opportunity to go home for a few days and come back before important business is actually taken up. Now, unless it is possible to get down to active business before July 14, why not make that date a week or 10 days later, in order that men who happen to live a considerable distance away may have an opportunity to go to their homes and return?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I made the proposition for two weeks because I asked the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] about the probabilities of his reporting the currency bill. He did not say it could be reported in two weeks, but said that it would be safe to make a provision or arrangement not to transact business for two weeks. At the end of that time I think he will be able to do something. But if at the end of that time certain gentlemen are away from here, even then it may not be necessary for them to come back unless they are notified, and they can be notified by wire.

Mr. BURNETT. We can be informed by wire if it is necessary for us to return?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. If my colleague wants to go away for two weeks and at the end of that time is uncertain as to what will be done and wishes to remain longer, if he will wire me I will attend to it.

Mr. BURNETT. I may say to my colleague that there are a number of Members who would like to go home and stay there for a while if there is no pressing business here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will promise to notify the gentleman by wire.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], referring to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], why the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency can not adjust himself to the action of the House just as well as the House can by its action adjust itself to the proposal of the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman who is proposing to do the business has, I think, the right of way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama——

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY NEXT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to put this in the form of unanimous consent; but we have an understanding that we have entered into this pact for two weeks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will that permit an adjournment on Tuesday, to carry us over the Fourth of July?

The SPEAKER. Three days from Tuesday will take it to Friday.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will it go to Friday, or through Friday?

The SPEAKER. It can only go three days.

Mr. MURDOCK. Friday is the Fourth of July.

The SPEAKER. Wednesday will be one day, Thursday two days, and Friday three days.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman can attain his object by objecting to this request for unanimous consent. Then, possibly provision could be made——

The SPEAKER. You can only adjourn for three days at a time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood, Mr. Speaker, that this committee that is going to Gettysburg will go there on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. We are going on Thursday, if Thursday is the 3d.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Thursday is the 3d. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House disagree to the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and that a conference with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be asked for.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama with reference to his resolution which he proposes to have considered, which provides that a conference be asked with the Senate, before there is any disagreement.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The bill has passed the House and has been returned from the Senate with certain amendments. The House has not disagreed to those amendments.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is mistaken. The resolution which has just been read from the Clerk's desk does disagree to the Senate amendments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The resolution as printed in the report reads:

That a conference be asked of the Senate upon the subject matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, that is not the resolution which I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution again, for the information of the House.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As I understand it, the gentleman is now proposing a resolution which is a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. CLAYTON. You may so consider it if you wish. I am offering this resolution now, and asking unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, if his resolution is considered will there be opportunity for a separate vote upon these two amendments?

Mr. CLAYTON. I can not say just exactly what the conference report will be, Mr. Speaker. It might be that the conferees would disagree to one of the Senate amendments and recede from its opposition to the other, or it might be that it would agree to both Senate amendments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Alabama evidently misunderstood my inquiry. What I asked of the gentleman was, Will this resolution, if unanimous consent is given for its consideration, prevent a separate vote now on these two amendments?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it would if it was adopted.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object to the consideration of the Senate amendments to this bill, but I do object to the consideration of this resolution which has been submitted by the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota objects.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to House bill No. 32.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The House is engaged in the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it in order for the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to call up a bill on the Union Calendar at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not at this particular juncture, but as soon as the Clerk finishes the call of committees it will be in order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Perhaps it will save some time, and I want to say to the gentleman what I said a moment ago, that I shall not object to the consideration of the amendments to this bill; but if it is proposed to adopt a resolution that will preclude a separate vote on these amendments, then the gentleman might as well understand now as later, that he will have to have a quorum present before he can adopt the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The matter about the resolution has been disposed of. The gentleman from Alabama will have an absolute right when we get through the call of committees to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, no one has made a point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota rose to a parliamentary inquiry and asked if it was in order for the gentleman from Alabama to make the motion when he did, and the Chair replied that it was not.

Mr. GARNER. He got the information.

The SPEAKER. He got the information that it was not in order at this time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a further inquiry, whether or not there are any bills on the calendar reported from any other committee?

The SPEAKER. There are not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not wish to require the Clerk to read the list of committees through, and I am willing, if the Chair holds the motion to be in order at any time, that it may be made now.

The SPEAKER. The motion will undoubtedly be in order after the finish of the call of the roster of committees.

Mr. PALMER. Will the genlteman from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. CLAYTON. With pleasure.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if it would be satisfactory to him to have the resolution which the gentleman from Alabama has asked unanimous consent to consider at this time considered now, with the understanding that the gentleman from South Dakota may offer an amendment to agree to one or the other of the Senate amendments?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if we can have an opportunity to vote on these two amendments separately and that a motion to concur, if desired, can be made, that is all I ask.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Alabama may be considered with the understanding that an amendment may be offered agreeing to one or the other or both of the Senate amendments.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman answer an inquiry?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will this permit a vote on each of the two amendments or only on one amendment?

Mr. PALMER. If an amendment is offered to the resolution there will be a vote on it.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry also. I did not understand the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor, but any gentleman has a right to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMER. I was asking unanimous consent, but I am reminded of the fact that I did not have the floor when I did it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, I intended no discourtesy, but what I wanted to do was to make a suggestion that perhaps would be agreeable to the gentleman from South Dakota. I understand that he wants a separate vote on the two propositions involved in the Senate amendments, the one proposition being the creation of another judgeship down here in the fourth circuit, and the other being the Cullop-Mann provision of the House bill which requires the President to make public the indorsements of any appointee to a judgeship. I can say to the gentleman that I shall ask, if I am on the conference committee, as I assume, of course, that I shall be, a separate vote on those propositions when the conference report comes back to the House. I may say to the gentleman that in all human probability there will be a separate vote on these propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Is the gentleman now talking about the resolution that he has here or is he talking about the conference report?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the conference report and making a suggestion, but it is pertinent to this resolution and pertinent to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

The SPEAKER. The House has an undoubted right to pass any kind of resolution it pleases, if it ever gets a chance, but the rule about conference reports is that a conference report is adopted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will modify this resolution by saying that there shall be a separate vote on each one of the propositions involved in the conference report.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama by which I think we can come to an agreement upon this matter. While the rule requires the House to vote on a conference report in toto, without separate votes on each proposition, yet the House can make an agreement that when the report comes in, if it sees fit, a separate vote shall be had upon each of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would submit to the gentleman from Indiana that the House can not make any such agreement. Such an agreement, if made, might bind all of the Members that are here, but it would not bind a Member who is not here, because such an agreement would be in contravention of the universal practice of the House. The House, however, can modify this resolution.

Mr. CULLOP. That is the point exactly.

The SPEAKER. By amendment it can change the resolution so that it can vote any way it pleases upon this amendment, but it can not do it by one of these loose agreements.

Mr. CULLOP. The suggestion that I desired to make to the gentleman from Alabama was that he modify his request for unanimous consent in that respect, and then I think we will have no trouble in relieving the situation.

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the resolution, then the House can amend the resolution in any way it pleases, provided, of course, the previous question is not ordered.

Mr. CULLOP. But in order to obtain unanimous consent I suggest that that modification be made in the request. Then I have no doubt that that consent will be given.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to be informed, Mr. Speaker, what the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not make any motion. He submitted a resolution that is on the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But objection was made, and then the gentleman modified that with a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole, to do what?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withheld that motion while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] made some suggestions, and, as a matter of fact, there is nothing now before the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is what I thought.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withheld that request, and now the gentleman from Alabama renews the request for unanimous consent to consider the resolution that is lying on the Clerk's table.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman has not made that request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was about to make another one if the Speaker will indulge me to state my own proposition.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but the Chair has stated it absolutely.

Mr. CLAYTON. Having failed to get the consent of the gentleman to the first proposition I now desire to ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 32 in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider these Senate amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama this: It is perfectly clear, and I have seen it repeatedly demonstrated here several times, that on a conference report the House must vote it either up or down, and you can not have a separate vote. Now, if the gentleman's request is granted, I understand we will have an opportunity for a separate vote here on both of these propositions to-day, but we will not have a chance to have a separate vote on them when it comes back from conference.

The SPEAKER. Of course not, unless the House takes some action which would contravene the rule.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, the House is not apt to do that but by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask if it would be in order to move to concur to the amendment of the Senate to House bill 32—amendment numbered 1?

The SPEAKER. When?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Right now.

Mr. CLAYTON. When this consent is given it would be.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not object to this consent.

The SPEAKER. If this consent of the gentleman from Alabama is granted, then the matter is in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the House can do what it pleases with it unless some gentleman moves the previous question and carries it, which cuts off amendments, debate, and everything else.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I anticipate that the gentleman from Alabama does not contemplate moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman if he does he must understand he will have to have a quorum of the House to adopt it. Now, there is no objection, so far as I am concerned, to the consideration of these amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from South Dakota state there is to be no separate vote without a quorum?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman did not so state and does not wish to be so quoted.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, I was going to say, if that is true, there is no necessity for wasting this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Now the Chair wishes to make a statement.

In the situation we are in now five-minute speeches are the practice of the House and have been for time immemorial. Yesterday, because nobody seemed to care anything about the time, the Chair let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] have an hour, and after he had done that he thought he ought to let the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have an hour. That, however, was in contravention of the practice of the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if no one else desires to be recognized, I desire to be recognized.

CURRENCY.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

SECRETARY OF STATE BRYAN ON THE CURRENCY BILL.

(Specially written for the Public Ledger.)

The currency bill, prepared by Chairman OWEN, of the Senate, and Chairman GLASS, of the House, in conjunction with President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo, is now before the country for discussion.

It is known as the President's bill, because his influence was paramount in reconciling the differences existing between those favoring currency legislation.

The President, in his message to Congress, urged immediate action and was felicitous in the language employed. He pointed out the need of legislation which will enable the business world to make use of its securities in times of emergency. While he did not outline a measure, his message should be interpreted in the light of the bill which has already been given to the public.

The first question to be considered is whether there should be immediate legislation. It would be hard to answer this question in the negative in view of the fact that the need for currency legislation has been emphasized in every quarter and by all who have cared to express themselves on the subject. The only justification that could be offered for delay would be that time was needed for an investigation of the subject.

This objection, however, can hardly be made when it is remembered that resort has been had to nearly every form of investigation during the last few years, so that it may be assumed that everyone who desires to form an opinion has had an opportunity to do so.

As a matter of fact, the fundamental principles involved in currency legislation are so well understood that no delay, however extended, and no investigation, however thorough, would be likely to change the minds of those whose duty it is to act upon the matter.

A request for delay may therefore be regarded as a motion for continuance, made by those who object to the principles upon which the bill is drawn; and a demand for further investigation can fairly be considered in the same way. So true is this that it is quite certain that those who now favor delay would, in all probability, have been the very ones to urge speedy action if the bill had been differently drawn.

When the bill is considered upon its merits one at once realizes that it is written from the standpoint of the people rather than from the standpoint of the financiers. The latter are quite unanimous in the belief that the issue of money is "a function of the banks" and that "the Government ought not to go into the banking business."

The Democratic Party, however, has consistently taken the position that the issue of money is "a function of the Government," and should not be delegated to banks. It all depends upon the point of view from which one considers this question, or for that matter any public question.

President Wilson, in his letter of acceptance and in his speeches, reiterated his determination to look at all questions from the standpoint of the people rather than from the standpoint of a privileged few. This was the central theme of his addresses, and he can not well depart from this position in the framing of a currency law, especially since the Democratic Party has never deviated from this position in its platforms.

If currency reform is to come under a Democratic President, a Democratic House, and a Democratic Senate, it must come along lines in harmony with Democratic history and doctrine.

The bill involves three fundamental principles:

First. The notes issued must be issued by the Government and not by the banks.

Second. The issue must be controlled by public servants and not by private institutions or individuals.

Third. The emergency currency issued must be issued through State banks as well as through national banks.

The bill as prepared observes these three requirements. The right of the Government to issue money is not surrendered to the banks, the control over the money so issued is not relinquished by the Government, and national banks are not given a monopoly of the benefits flowing from the issue of these emergency notes.

The people, having safeguarded their rights in the three particulars above mentioned, can afford to deal liberally with the remaining provisions of the bill. The regional reserve banks will prove of great advantage to business. Each reserve bank will be a commercial center, and this center will be much nearer to the extremes than the few large cities are to the banks which have been compelled to reach the public through them.

These regional reserve banks will give to the individual banks a security for their reserves that is lacking under the present system—a security which will go far toward preventing panics.

The national banks, however much they may be inclined to object to the extension to State banks of the right to borrow emergency Treasury notes, will find this bill so advantageous as to make them willing to accept its provisions. The right to borrow Treasury notes on an equitable basis without having to put up bonds is a distinct benefit, and yet a benefit which can be granted with advantage to the community represented as well as with safety to the Government.

When a bank is compelled to put up bonds as a security it has already parted with as much money as it can possibly borrow upon them. Hence a bond basis reduces to a minimum the advantages to be derived from borrowing.

Why should the Government require bonds as security for the loans to be made when the other security provided for is adequate? The Government can have no interest in prescribing onerous conditions to the banking world. The regional reserve bank, representing as it does the banks of its district, would be financially good for the money borrowed even if it was not required to put up specific security, but its security is made greater by the fact that collateral will be put up to secure each loan.

It is possible, under this plan, to provide immediate relief to any section of the country, and thus cure in the very beginning a condition which, if allowed to continue, might precipitate a panic.

It is not contended that the bill is perfect in detail. No one, or even a few, can hope to draft any measure upon any important subject which will in every detail be satisfactory to the 500 Senators and Representatives who must pass upon it. Whatever defects it may have will be brought out by discussion and cured by amendment.

But, considering the principles involved, who can afford to oppose so wise a measure as that now offered? Not the general public, because their rights are fully protected. Not the business interests, for their needs are fully met. Not the State banks, for they come for the first time into association with the national banks in the enjoyment of accommodations furnished by the Government. Not the average national bank, because the President's plan is to it a life preserver. Who, then, can object?

Only two classes: Those who dispute the right of the people to issue through their Government the money which the people need, and those who, distrusting the representatives chosen by the people to guard the public welfare, would deny the Government officials control over the issuance of emergency notes.

W. J. BRYAN.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment numbered 1, page 1, line 9, strike out all after the word "therein" down to and including the word "judge" in line 11.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the language that it strikes out.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, that is what is called the Cullop-Mann amendment to the bill and which the Senate struck out. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in that amendment, in order to get it before the House.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that we disagree to that amendment. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama by moving that we disagree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] makes the preferential motion to disagree to what is known as the Cullop-Mann amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the proposition to agree is preferential. That brings the two Houses together more quickly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was wrong as to that. The motion to agree is preferential in this situation.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, this proposition, in a word, is this:

The House considered and passed a bill to create an additional judge in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, an emergency matter of a very urgent character. In the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered an amendment incorporating into the bill what has come to be known as the Cullop amendment, requiring the President to make public the indorsers of the person appointed to the place.

When the bill went to the Senate, the Senate amended it by striking out this Mann-Cullop amendment. The proposition of the gentleman from Alabama now is to agree to the Senate amendment. In other words, a vote "aye" upon the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] will strike out of the bill the Mann-Cullop amendment, requiring the President to make public the names of the indorsers of the successful applicant for the place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have no objection to the ingrafting upon the laws of the country this principle of the publicity of indorsers of Federal judges, although I think it is of doubtful value. I think it is likely to be nugatory, because I doubt the power of the Congress to require the President to make public those indorsements. I doubt the power of the Congress to control the President in the manner and method of his selection of Federal officials whom he is empowered by the Constitution or by the laws of the country to appoint. But I am opposed, however, to the adoption of the Mann-Cullop amendment upon this bill only because I see in it a very serious danger to the merits of this proposition. If the House insists upon this amendment, and the Senate in its present frame of mind insists that it shall not go into the law, however much we may like to see this principle settled one way or the other, our Pennsylvania judgeship will not come out of the legislative hopper. I think, therefore, that a single judgeship in a single district in the country ought not to be complicated and the people of that district deprived of their just rights in the premises, deprived of the opportunity to have their causes tried promptly in that great district, by a difference of opinion between the Senate and the House upon a general matter of legislation such as this proposition.

Reference has been made here to the fact that the Baltimore convention in its platform declared in favor of this proposition, and therefore it is a party measure. The Baltimore platform expressed words of commendation of the principle of publicity of indorsements of all Federal positions, and that is as far as it went. Surely it did not mean that every time the Congress creates a new office either in the executive branch or the judicial branch of the Government that we should and are bound to attach to it as applying to that particular case this general principle of Executive publicity of indorsement of applicants for office.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PALMER. I should be perfectly willing, if a general measure should be introduced, to repeat my commendation of that proposition and to make it a part of the general law of the land, because, as I said before, it is not of sufficient importance to object; but I protest it is not fair in this case.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I am not only opposed to the Senate amendments, but I am also now opposed to this bill for the reason that I gave yesterday. There is no condition now existing that requires the passage of this measure. The legislation at any time is not to be commended, but the situation now is such that its enactment is not required. The Commerce Court is to be abolished. This will leave a number of judges to be assigned for other work. There is a vacancy to-day existing in the State of Pennsylvania, or in the circuit of which it is part, by the removal of Judge Archbald from the Commerce Court. Now, then, the President can appoint his successor; he has a right to appoint him from any State in the Union, and can appoint him from the State of Pennsylvania, can appoint him, if he so desires, from the city of Philadelphia, where it will meet every requirement that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is asking for in this legislation. He has a right to appoint some one to fill that vacancy, and he can go there and take charge of that docket and dispose of the business that is said to have accumulated there now in that court.

But here is the situation which I want to call to your attention: We are making two judges for one district in the State of Pennsylvania, which is unfair to the public and, in my judgment, is absolutely unnecessary at this time. If the Pennsylvania district has gotten into the unfortunate condition that it seems to be in now, it is one of the unfortunate things that the public in that locality should bear and not the general public throughout the entire country; so that there is no necessity now—no real necessity—for the passage of this measure.

Now, as to this amendment, this is the language of the Baltimore platform. It applies to this subject, and it applies to an amendment to a bill that is general in its nature. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] opposed it as a general law when it was up on that former occasion, in February, 1912.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CULLOP. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman. I do not want to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania an injustice.

Mr. PALMER. I voted for the Cullop proposition when it was before the House as a general proposition. I object to its being fastened separately upon every judgeship bill.

Mr. CULLOP. I am glad to know the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted for it then, and hope he will do so now. It will not be fastened separately upon every separate judgeship. The proposition was objected to at first, in 1912, because it was a general proposition attached to a special bill; and now some gentlemen object to it because it is a special law fastened to a special bill; so that the gentlemen who are opposed to it are apparently very hard to please on that subject. They favor the proposition, but always want it to be tacked on to some other measure. They seem to want but apparently hope they will never get it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the language of the Baltimore platform. It is not subject to misconstruction; it is free of ambiguity; it is plain, direct, and specific, and applies directly to this principle and directly to this question:

> We commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are to be made.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. In the discussion of this measure yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said, or I understood him to say, that this provision in the Democratic platform was to be regarded simply as a suggestion to the President and not as binding upon the House as a matter of legislation. What does the gentleman from Indiana think about that proposition?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, the construction of this language in the Baltimore platform will not bear that interpretation at all; it is not subject to such a construction. To recommend means to indorse, and the Democratic Party in its national convention heartily indorsed that proposition, and a Democratic House here ought to carry out the provisions of a Democratic platform as made in a Democratic national convention. If it was good enough to indorse before an election, it is good enough to follow after an election.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Can the gentleman tell us what the case was where the precedent was established that was commended in that platform—as to what took place in the House?

Mr. CULLOP. In the House I offered an amendment to the bill, changing a circuit judge in an Illinois district to a district judge. When that bill was under consideration I offered an amendment to it enacting this proposition into a general law, and it was adopted then upon a roll call, and it made the publicity of these recommendations general as to all judicial offices. In fact there were two roll calls involving the proposition and each time the question carried by a good majority.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then it was an amendment offered to a bill practically identical with the pending bill?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly; and the Democratic House indorsed it on two roll calls. When the roll was called twice on the proposition it had a decided majority in this House. And when the roll was called upon this amendment when this bill was before the House for consideration, it was adopted by a decided majority. In fact this proposition was indorsed by the Democrats in the last Congress on three roll calls and each time it carried by good majorities; it has also been carried in this House on a roll call by a good majority and it would seem that the Democratic Party is now thoroughly pledged to it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes, in a moment; and if we are to constantly take it out at the behest of the Senate, we are not going to get this legislation adopted soon. The way to get it adopted, the way to get the policy entered upon, is to attach the legislation to some such bill as this and then stand by it. I insist it properly belongs to this bill, and I insist it is the proper time to stand by the policy and insist it now be entered upon and become one of the fixed policies of this Government. Now, is the time and this is the proper place.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a further question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not the adoption of his amendment by the two roll-call votes which adopted it as the gentleman says by an overwhelming vote, that was indorsed in the Baltimore platform?

Mr. WILLIS. Good.

Mr. CULLOP. It was; and it was the only measure on that subject passed by the Democratic House upon which the Baltimore convention could have based this plank in its platform. That was the only proposition that had been enacted into law or passed by a Democratic House bearing upon this proposition. Now, my fellow Democrats, I ask you to-day whether you stand ready to repudiate your national platform within less than a year after it was adopted, or whether you as Democrats are willing to stand by the doctrines upon which you won the national election last November, and our party was called into power. Shall we keep the faith, administer the responsibility as directed or will we repudiate the doctrine and fail to discharge our duty as directed by the people?

To this doctrine our party is unalterably pledged, the people have approved it, and we are directed to carry it into effect. Shall we do it, or shall we falter, and fail to obey the mandate of the people? Shall we as Democrats here early in our tenure of power permit our adversaries to lead us to the defeat of a measure indorsed by our national convention, and indorsed four times by the Democrats in this and in the last Congress? Let us consider this proposition carefully before we vote it down. Let us not vote it down, but on the contrary let us adopt it by a rousing majority and keep faith with the people who have so generously intrusted us with power.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOP. I do.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana if it was not himself who brought this matter directly before the committee on resolutions at Baltimore?

Mr. CULLOP. No, sir; it was not. It was not necessary for me to do so. It was so universally accepted as the Democratic doctrine that it required no individual to bring it before that convention to remind it of a cardinal doctrine of our party. The Democrats in Congress had placed their seal of approval upon it and the people of the entire country had approved their course in doing so. The doctrine for which we contend here is fundamental; it lies at the very root of free institutions; it is one wholesome to their endurance; it inspires confidence in those high in authority; it removes their conduct out of the reach of reproach in performing high, responsible, and important public duties; it gives to the people an opportunity for redress and to prevent impositions, for which otherwise there is no remedy for their prevention.

Mr. Speaker, throughout the history of this great Republic, with all its illustrious Chief Executives, we will search the history of their administrations in vain to find a single one who has opposed the principle for which we contend here. No one, though often requested, has ever, I assert, refused to cheerfully furnish the information which this amendment requires. It should be ingrafted as a law upon our statute books. For any one to have refused would have been a reflection upon his willingness to deal candidly with the people. No obstacles have ever been placed in the way of publicity by any of them. It may not always have been given, but certainly none has ever refused to do so, and I hope no one ever called to that office will ever feel inclined to deny publicity to a confiding people who honored him of every act he may be called upon to perform in the discharge of his public duties. As surely as he does, he will forfeit public confidence and invoke the distrust of the people.

This measure, as I have declared heretofore, has for its object, for its sole purpose, the protection of the Chief Executive and the courts from unjust criticism. It will, I hope and believe, perform this mission, and will inspire public confidence in both.

It infringes upon no constitutional prerogative nor does it impose any unreasonable requirement. Some speak of this as a stroke at some constitutional power now belonging to the President. I deny it. Congress has the power to take, under the Constitution, the appointment of every judge, other than the appointment of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, from the President and give it to the Attorney General or to the Supreme Court or any one of its members or to any of the other departments of the Government. This power is clearly defined by the Constitution, and it only belongs to the President because Congress permits him to exercise it. This only provides a duty for him to perform in making appointments, one, in my judgment, the present Chief Executive will cheerfully accept and welcome the opportunity to have thrown on the searchlight of the fullest publicity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Which side is the gentleman from Tennessee on?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the proper construction of the platform utterance upon this question is not, so far as I am personally concerned, material just now. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is correct in his construction, and I am incorrect in my construction as to the meaning of the platform, I nevertheless am in this position: When this matter came originally before the House, in an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] to a bill creating a judgeship in the State of Illinois, I voted against the proposition.

That vote was made an issue in a campaign which I subsequently had for renomination for Congress in my district. I met that issue on the stump numerous times before my people. I then took the position that I took originally in the House and the position which I take now. And so, measured by all the practices and all the canons and all the teachings as to party platforms, I am in a position where I am committed to the people whom I directly represent against this proposition. So much, therefore, for my own position upon the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word as to the merits. I am opposed to the proposition, not because I am opposed to publicity but because I do not think the Congress has the power to do that which the amendment involves.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon the Congress all legislative power that may be constitutionally exercised. It confers upon the President of the United States the executive power, and among others is the power and the responsibility of appointing the judicial officers created by the Constitution and by law. Now, as I said a few days ago in the discussion of this question, if the President of the United States should issue a proclamation declaring that every Member of Congress, before he voted on any matter of legislation, should make public all indorsements that he had received by letter or personally upon that proposed legislation, such a proclamation would be laughed to scorn. Every gentleman here knows that that would exceed the power of the President of the United States.

The same Constitution which gives the legislative authority to Congress gives to the President the power and responsibility of these judicial appointments; and I maintain that it lies beyond the constitutional power of the legislative body to impose this condition upon the President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional authority and responsibility, which authority and power are given to him just the same as the legislative power is given to the Congress.

It was upon that ground that I voted against this amendment while a Republican President was appointing the judges. Upon that same ground I stand ready to vote, and I shall vote again in the same way, when a Democratic President is appointing the judges.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the Democratic platform adopted in 1908?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Democratic platform of 1908 declares in favor of publicity of indorsements for public officers, and in that same connection I should like to ask him if he indorses the platform of his party, adopted at Baltimore last year, which reaffirms the doctrine that was announced in the platform of 1908 on this subject?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I presume the gentleman did not hear the beginning of my remarks. I stated with perfect candor my situation in regard to the matter. I stated that I voted against it before, that I was challenged upon that vote in my district, that I made my campaign for renomination upon the position which I then took upon this question, and that whatever may be the construction of the platform I, at least, am bound, according to all the teachings and practices of politics, by the position which I took before my constitutents, which position was indorsed by them.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, furthermore, that this amendment would not reach the purpose that is desired, and for this reason: This requires that the President shall make public the indorsements of the man he appoints. Now, Mr. Speaker, if he makes public the indorsements of every man whom he appoints how can the public tell which of these indorsements was the controlling influence, or whether any of these indorsements was the controlling influence with the President? He may make the appointment upon indorsements, he may make it in spite of the indorsements, and he may make it without any indorsement whatever.

Furthermore, what public good is to be accomplished by making public the indorsements of the man whom he appoints? And if you are going into that, why not go to the full end and require him to make public—if you could do so, which you can not—the indorsements of those whom he does not appoint? What is the logic of it? What is the purpose of it? What end do you seek? I do not object to the President doing this if he sees proper. I merely deny the power of Congress to enact the statute. I should not object to making public all letters I receive in regard to legislation, but I think no man would insist that the President could, by proclamation, compel me to do it. No more can the Congress compel him, by statute, to do this thing. You can not search his conscience by statute nor obtain his reasons by enactments.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this is not entirely a new proposition or one without precedent. Numerous Presidents have been called upon by the Senate of the United States on matters very similar to this—called upon by resolution—to furnish indorsements. And just here let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not at all certain but—in fact, I am inclined to believe—that the Senate of the United States would be within its constitutional right if, upon a question of confirmation of a judge arising, it should see fit to call upon the President for such indorsements and papers as might be before him touching that appointment, because under the Constitution the Senate is charged with a joint responsibility with the President in the matter of these appointments. They are appointed "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But, Mr. Speaker, even that right of the Senate has been repeatedly denied by Presidents of the United States in cases almost, if not quite, analogous—by Jackson, by Tyler, by Cleveland, and various other Presidents, if I remember aright—where it involved a resolution of the Senate passed in pursuance of a desire on the Senate's part to obtain information to enable it to pass on the question of confirmation or some other question in the performance of its constitutional duty. If the Senate, which is charged with a joint responsibility, can not by resolution accomplish the end, how can we expect by statute to accomplish a purpose lying beyond our constitutional power? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this proposition be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ascertain how many Members there are on this side who wish to speak.

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he amend his request by making the time 1 hour. There are at least half a dozen Members on this side who desire to speak on the very important questions involved. The whole proceeding is by unanimous consent, and I am amazed that the gentleman from Alabama, after 30 minutes have been taken on that side, should suggest closing debate in 10 minutes. Gentlemen on this side desire at least an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he was careful to recognize gentlemen on different sides of the question.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not criticizing the Chair.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will modify the request, but before doing so I wish to say that the gentleman from Wyoming seems to have his amazer in unusually good working order; he is usually amazed by common occurrences here. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, aside from that, I may say to the gentleman, treating him now seriously, as he is entitled to be treated always, that I think 30 minutes is enough, and I hope he will agree to that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that may be agreeable to the gentleman from Wyoming, but I would like 10 minutes' time.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Kansas is also amazed.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; but I will say that this will not go along much further without a quorum unless we have an opportunity to debate the matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to be agreeable, and I want gentlemen to have all the time they want.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not appear to have that attitude.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I hope the question of no quorum will not be raised. I can not keep a quorum here.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I think there ought to be two hours' debate. I think one hour's debate is desired on this side, especially if the gentleman from Kansas wants time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly of the opinion that we need a quorum, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Now, can the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Kansas and the rest of them come to an agreement about what they want?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want any time myself. It may be a few gentlemen upon this side want some time. I do not think I shall want any.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that we will try to get along with 1 hour, with the understanding that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will have 15 minutes of the hour. If the gentleman from Alabama has not anybody upon his side——

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I said perhaps there would be somebody. I do not think that I shall want to occupy any time. It is possible that in the range of this illuminating discussion I may feel called to say something myself, but so far it has been so well illuminated that I have not thought proper to say anything. I would think that the gentleman ought not to want all of the time. The gentleman from Kansas wants 15 minutes. How much time would the gentleman from South Dakota be content with?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that personally I do not care for any time, but there have been enough requests for time upon this side so that we could use 1 hour, but we are willing to accept 45 minutes, and that gives the gentleman from Kansas 15 minutes and ourselves 45.

Mr. CLAYTON. But, Mr. Speaker, equality is equity, and the gentleman in his proposition——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. We have no objection to the gentleman having an hour upon his side.

Mr. CLAYTON. We do not wish an hour. On which side of this proposition is the gentleman, may I ask?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think that is material at this time.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is very material whether he is for it or aganist it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I shall object to any agreement which is made which does not make the division of time according to those who favor and those who oppose the motion before the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have said to the gentleman from Alabama, and I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, that we desire 45 minutes. The gentleman from Kansas, I understand, wishes 15 minutes. We are ready to entertain any proposition that the gentleman from Alabama may make that gives us that time.

The SPEAKER. Does that mean an hour or 45 minutes altogether?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It means 1 hour upon this side of the aisle.

The SPEAKER. That is 1 hour for the Republicans.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that I made the motion, and that therefore I occupy the affirmative position upon it, and I assume that the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Kansas are opposed to the motion which I have made, and upon that assumption I am willing to have an hour's time given to further debate, and to divide it equally between the sides on that proposition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will tell the House upon which side of the question he stands?

Mr. CLAYTON. I made the motion to agree to the Senate amendment No. 1, and I think the gentleman has comprehension enough to understand that that shows the attitude of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But the gentleman made the statement that he did that to get the matter before the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman made no such statement with any such meaning as that. The gentleman made that statement, of course, to bring it down to a voting proposition; but the gentleman does not play politics, as do some gentlemen upon that side, who frequently make motions and do not support them. I do not refer to the gentleman from South Dakota.

The gentleman from Alabama has never been guilty of playing that sort of politics in the House up to this time.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, my request is that one hour be given to the debate on this proposition, at the end of the hour the debate on the amendment to be closed, and that the time, one hour, be equally divided between those favoring the motion and those opposing it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. In the event of the adoption of this agreement, who will have control of the time upon the respective sides? I want some understanding about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in the chair will control the time for both sides, unless there is an agreement about it. Under the rule as always practiced by anybody presiding, the Chair gives as much time to the affirmative as to the negative, and vice versa. If any agreement is entered into about the control of the time, of course that is observed by the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama ought to realize that all these proceedings are practically by unanimous consent, and my "amazer," as he terms it, is still working. I will say to the gentleman that I am more amazed than ever that he quibbles over the matter of giving an hour's time to this side for the discussion of this question or these important questions. It does not occur to me it is a matter that need disturb the gentleman whether the time is to be used on this side for or against his proposition. The usual manner of dividing the time is to divide it by giving control of the time to one gentleman on either side. The gentleman from South Dakota has asked for an hour on this side, and the gentleman might just as well understand that unless we get some sort of a reasonable agreement the proceedings are likely to be closed. If the gentleman is anxious to have his measure passed—I am anxious that it shall be passed in proper form—I can not understand why he does not give the House, in the absence of any other pressing business, an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, is the gentleman through with his deliverance?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is through.

Mr. CLAYTON. It sounds like that bird speech the gentleman has been making three or four times before the House. I have heard it before and will hear it again; next time it will be on the bird subject, perhaps, or something else; but, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the last suggestion made by the gentleman that there is nothing else for the House to do, I will say that next to this bill on the calendar, which I desire to call next after this is disposed of, is an amendment to the Erdman arbitration law, and I want to say to the gentleman that I hope, if this matter can be disposed of without raising the question of a quorum and without much delay, to endeavor to pass that amendment to the Erdman Act in an effort to avert a railroad strike, the largest that the country has ever known. The bill is now on the calendar and ought to have the consideration of the House. It has been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, amended, and it is agreed to by all parties concerned, and it will keep off the disastrous effect that may come from a referendum strike vote now being taken by a large number of railroad employees. Now, I have no disposition to be captious, I do not want to be, about reasonable debate, but it seems to me when we have already been talking for nearly an hour about this simple amendment, which we all understand, no amount of debate is going to change any man's mind on it——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact there has been about 30 minutes' debate on the proposition on that side of the House, not on the same side of the question——

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, no——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And some 20 minutes in trying to make this agreement——

Mr. CLAYTON. I think the gentleman himself consumed some time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota (continuing). I think the gentleman ought to be satisfied with half an hour on that side of the House and let us have an hour on this side of the House, which equals the time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I can not agree to anything except an equal division of time. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to put the request of the gentleman from Alabama for an hour.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I presume gentlemen will be recognized under the five-minute rule for debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, what is the request of the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request is to have an hour to be divided equally between the Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RODDENBERY. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If a gentleman desires to submit some remarks in opposition to the motion to concur in the Senate amendment, he may obtain recognition for that purpose in what way?

The SPEAKER. By asking unanimous consent. The rule is explicit that, on an amendment, in the situation in which we find ourselves, there is 5 minutes' debate for and 5 minutes' debate against the proposition, and we have already had about 10 or 15 minutes, nobody raising the question.

Mr. RODDENBERY. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia can get the right to speak by moving to concur with an amendment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I was going to make that inquiry, namely, if recognition could not be had by moving a substitute.

The SPEAKER. You have a right to do anything you please on this amendment that the House has a right to do.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, before making the motion I desire to occupy about 10 minutes, and maybe a little longer, in submitting some views touching this motion. If necessary, I will make some sort of a motion in order to do it. I shall be glad to proceed by making a motion, but not having a desire to make a motion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the matter before the House is the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to submit a proposition for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask that there be two hours of debate on the pending amendment, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], 15 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and 45 minutes by myself.

Mr. FOSTER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not the demand of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] for the regular order equivalent to moving the previous question in this condition of affairs?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is. It has just exactly the same effect.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall not object to this request, but I will to any others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed for one minute.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this matter of an additional judge for Philadelphia has been before the Judiciary Committee for quite a while. There have been hearings had before that committee, and there is great necessity, in order that public business may be discharged, that this bill should become a law at this time in order that the situation may be relieved. We ought not here this afternoon to delay the passage of this bill and prevent the discharge of public duty there, with many litigants waiting for the disposition of their cases, because of this question which has come before us, from the Baltimore convention, perhaps. We had best forget the Baltimore convention and everything that happened there and get down to the passage of this most important bill, which the country, and especially the Philadelphia litigants, need.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming raises the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the vote on a call of the House or on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]?

The SPEAKER. That has already been carried.

Mr. MURDOCK. No, Mr. Speaker; the motion of the gentleman from Alabama has not been carried, if the Chair will permit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the motion and announced that those in favor of it should vote "aye" and those opposed should vote "no," and declared that the "ayes" had it.

Mr. SABATH. That was on the call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Of course it was on the call of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am speaking as to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The vote that was just taken was not on that.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the motion of the gentleman from Alabama is pending.

The SPEAKER. But no division was taken on that.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that, debate having been exhausted upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], there was nothing before the House except his motion, and therefore upon a call the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HARDWICK rose.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman is clearly in error in his contention. The call of the House is simply to get the presence of a quorum, and it is not——

The SPEAKER. Of course; there is no question about it. The Chair declines to hear any argument on that side of it.

Mr. PALMER. I have not denied that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PALMER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion in a minute. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is recognized.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker had actually put the question and the House had not divided upon it, because after a discussion relative to a unanimous-consent proposition all the debate had been exhausted on the proposition; and the Chair had put the question to the House and the point of no quorum was then made.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken as to his facts. What happened is this, that the Chair started to put the question, but never did put the question, because as soon as he rose and stated that the question was on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] to concur in this amendment, he got no further, and then the gentleman from Alabama rose and asked something about unanimous consent that debate close. That is the condition it was in, and there is no question about what the call of the House is on. The call of the House is to ascertain whether we can muster a quorum or not.

Mr. WILLIS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] demands a division. Those in favor of the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-three gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-one gentlemen have arisen in the negative, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Nineteen gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a unanimous-consent request, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that we divide the time on this question and have two hours' debate on the question of these amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no discussion is in order, a gentleman over on that side having made the point of no quorum.

Mr. DYER. I did not make it.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that the Chair will count again. [After counting.] Twenty gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. The other side is demanded. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-six gentlemen have arisen in the negative—not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if this roll call is for the purpose of procuring a quorum, and if we should vote "present," or is it a yea-and-nay vote on the pending question?

The SPEAKER. This is a call of the House, and gentlemen will answer "present" if they want to answer at all. It is not a vote on any proposition. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 2, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers that have accumulated in the Department of Commerce that are no longer needed or useful in transacting the current business of the department and have no permanent value or historical interest. The communication and accompanying paper will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] as the members of the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment of the committee.

INHABITED ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 120).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th ultimo, a statement of the names, residences, and occupations of persons owning and renting houses and rooms within the more densely "inhabited alleys" of the District of Columbia, and also a copy of a directory of alleys in Washington, D. C., which, on motion of Mr. WORKS, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

LOUISA S. JOHNSON AGAINST UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 121).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion of law filed by the court in the cause of Louisa S. Johnson, widow of William Johnson, deceased, v. United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

STATUE OF ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the lieutenant governor of the State of Michigan, presenting to the Government and the people of the United States on behalf of the Michigan Legislature a marble statue of the late Zachariah Chandler, of that State, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,

To the SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.:

Pursuant to action of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, there has been erected in the Capitol of the United States a marble statue of the late Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan. On behalf of the people of this State, I have the honor and pleasure of presenting to the Government and people of the United States this statue of one whose ability, strength of character, and achievement, both in State and National affairs, entitled him not only to a place as one of Michigan's favorite sons, but also to a place as one of the Nation's great statesmen. Senator Chandler came to Michigan while still a young man. Entering into the business life of Michigan's chief city, he acquired a competence and then gave his time and ability to public affairs. He had not the opportunity for a finished literary education, but from his broad business experience he garnered a knowledge more thorough than any college course could have furnished. He was a man of firm convictions and unchanging devotion to public duty. Every student of history will recognize in Senator Chandler one of the great men of the period in which he lived. He was a tower of strength to every cause he espoused and his grim determination and thorough preparedness made him the center of any conflict in which he took part. He neither asked nor gave quarter.

Such rugged and uncompromising characters are necessary in every great crisis, and Michigan presents this statue that future generations may know that in this, as in every age, true greatness is measured by patriotic and unselfish devotion to duty.

Very respectfully,

JOHN Q. ROSS,
Lieutenant Governor of Michigan.

MUSKEGON, MICH., June 17, 1913.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, out of order, if I may prefer the request, I would ask unanimous consent to consider Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, now on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent out of order to consider a concurrent resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER for Mr. SMITH of Michigan June 26, 1913, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Zachariah Chandler, presented by the State of Michigan to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the purity of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table Senate concurrent resolution No. 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks for the immediate consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 5, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read Senate concurrent resolution No. 5, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER for Mr. SMITH of Michigan June 26, 1913, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Zachariah Chandler, presented by the State of Michigan, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps it would be better to follow the usual course of such resolutions. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to call up Senate resolution 119.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed, and so notifies the Senator from Michigan, that this resolution is before the Committee on the Library and has not been reported.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to give notice that on Monday, July 28, at 3 o'clock p. m., I shall call up Senate resolution 119 and address the Senate relative to the public services of Zachariah Chandler, in connection with the presentation of his statue to the Government.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2272) providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 120.

Whereas it appears from investigation recently made by the Senate of the United States and otherwise that polygamy still exists in certain places in the United States, notwithstanding prohibitory statutes enacted by the several States thereof; and

Whereas the practice of polygamy is generally condemned by the people of the United States, and there is a demand for the more effectual prohibition thereof by placing the subject under Federal jurisdiction and control, at the same time reserving to each State the right to make and enforce its own laws relating to marriage and divorce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the application be made, and hereby is made, to Congress, under the provisions of Article V of the Constitution of the United States, for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall be prohibited and Congress shall be given power to enforce such prohibition by appropriate legislation; further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is directed, to transmit copies of this application to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the several Members of said bodies representing this State therein.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. BRISTOW. I submit sundry amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill S. 2639, known as the currency bill. I ask that they be read.

The Secretary read the amendments, as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. BRISTOW to the bill (S. 2639) to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, for furnishing an elastic currency, affording means of rediscounting commercial paper, and to establish a more effective supervision of banking in the United States, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 19, line 24, after the word "purposes," insert "and notes and mortgages representing farm loans made as provided for in section 27 of this act," and on page 20, in line 10, strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "except in the case of farm mortgages," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"Upon the indorsement of any member bank any Federal reserve bank may discount notes and bills of exchange arising out of commercial transactions; that is, notes and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, and notes and mortgages representing farm loans made as provided for in section 27 of this act, the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount, within the meaning of this act; but such definition shall not include notes or bills issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, or other investment securities, except notes or bills having a maturity of not exceeding four months and secured by United States bonds or bonds issued by any State, county, or municipality of the United States. Notes and bills admitted to discount under the terms of this paragraph must have a maturity of not more than 45 days, except in the case of farm mortgages."

On page 25, line 14, after the word "notes," strike out the word "and" and insert a comma; in the same line, after the word "bills," insert the words "and farm mortgages"; so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"Any Federal reserve bank may, upon vote of its directors, make application to the Federal Reserve Board, through the local Federal reserve agent, for such amount of the Treasury notes hereinbefore provided for as it may deem best. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral security to protect the notes for which application is made, equal in amount to the sum of the notes thus applied for. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, bills, and farm mortgages accepted for rediscount under the provisions of sections 13, 14, and 15 of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board shall be authorized at any time to call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional deposits of security."

On page 38, in lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "nine months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five years," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"That any national banking association not situated in a reserve city or central reserve city may make loans secured by improved and unencumbered farm lands, and so much of section 5137 of the Revised Statutes as prohibits the making of such loans by banks so situated shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but no such loan shall be made for a longer time than five years, nor for an amount exceeding 50 per cent of the actual value of the property offered as security, and such property shall be situated within the Federal reserve district in which the bank is located. Any such bank may make such loans in an aggregate sum equal to 25 per cent of its capital and surplus or 50 per cent of its time deposits."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that the amendments which I propose authorize national banks to loan money on farm mortgages that run for a period of not more than five years, and authorize such securities as a basis for circulation. I offer these amendments now, and desire to state that if any legislation is enacted providing for an asset currency I intend to insist that long-time farm loans shall be included as securities which may be used as a basis for such currency. A farm loan conservatively made is as good a security as can be had. The farm is the very basis of our national prosperity. We are now having learned discussions in regard to various systems of farm credit, the purpose being in some way to reduce the burden of interest which the farming population of our country is now bearing. To make farm mortgages the basis for circulation would certainly reduce the rate of interest for such security.

United States bonds bearing 2 per cent, with circulation privileges, have been selling at a premium for many years. They sell as readily as 3 per cent bonds without the circulating privilege. It is proposed in this bill to make provision by which the banks may hypothecate short-time paper of business men as a basis for additional currency. The success of nine-tenths of the business men whose notes are thus hypothecated depends upon the prosperity of the American farm. Unless the farmer succeeds and the land yields its harvest the notes of these business men are worthless. Yet men tell us that the mortgage on the farm itself, the very foundation of our entire business structure, is not a desirable security as a basis for circulation. Such an argument, in my opinion, is unsound. I am against the bill as it is drawn. It is a strained effort to satisfy the so-called Money Trust and the financial inflationists. It is a combination of the conservative with the radical theories in such a manner as to contain the objectionable features of both systems.

I expect to offer many other amendments to the bill, but the discussion of other features I shall take up when it is more properly before the Senate.

I ask that the amendments be printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection. it is so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk a part of an article which appeared in a Washington newspaper a day or two ago, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the Washington Post of Tuesday, July 1, 1913, as follows:

WILSON DEMANDS ALL LOBBY FACTS—GOES TO THE CAPITOL AND PREVENTS PROPOSED DELAY OF PROBE—INQUIRY IS ON TO-MORROW—SHERLEY TO OFFER RESOLUTION FOR SEPARATE HOUSE HEARING—FORMER PAGE SUBPŒNAED—M'MICHAELS, CLAIMED BY MULHALL TO HAVE BEEN ONE OF HIS AGENTS, FOUND NEAR HIS HOME AND SUMMONED BEFORE SENATE INQUISITORS—FORMER PRESIDENT KIRBY, OF THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, HALTED AT SAN FRANCISCO—COUNSEL JAMES A. EMERY AND DAVID M. PARRY AMONG SCORES OF WITNESSES CALLED TO TESTIFY—STEPS TAKEN TO GET POSSESSION OF MULHALL'S CORRESPONDENCE.

President Wilson yesterday went to the Capitol and gave the speed gear of the lobby committee a vigorous turn. Owing to the Democratic caucus, which is wrestling more or less successfully with the tariff, all other business had been temporarily laid aside.

It was not the intention to resume the lobby hearing until July 8. President Wilson thought this an unusual delay, and said so during a short talk with Chairman OVERMAN. Then followed a conference between the Democratic members of the committee, and a decision to resume to-morrow morning was reached.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as the author of the resolution under which the committee is acting and as a member of the committee I challenge the article which has just been read. I do not know whether the matter contained in it be true or false. If it is false, the newspapers which have published it have committed as great a crime against decency and fairness as has been committed by any of the lobbyists brought before and exposed by the committee. If the matter contained in it be true, then the blame passes over to higher place and greater responsibility.

It is unfair that there shall go to the country the false information that the committee of which the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is the head is prosecuting the work committed to it by the Senate either indifferently or neglectfully. I desire to say that this article appears to me to put the chairman of the committee in about this attitude, as though he were a child who had not performed all that was expected of him and had been drawn across the knees of an angry parent and spanked and told to go and be better and do better.

I wish to say for the executive head of this committee that I have never seen an instance of more zeal, more diligence, more unflagging energy than he has displayed in the conduct of the affairs of the committee. It is suggested at least that we are not desirous of exposing the rottenness that seems to lie all around us, notwithstanding the fact that the committee organized immediately, proceeded immediately to its work, and held sessions every day and almost every night, until interrupted by the higher demands upon the Democratic members arising out of the caucus which is now in progress. But until then not one moment had been allowed to pass without being occupied and improved in the exposure of the lobbyists who have congregated not around the Capitol alone, but who have organized themselves throughout the entire country. In suspension only because the Democratic members of the committee felt it necessary to attend their caucus, we are now held up to the scorn of the American people, and it is suggested that if it were not for the lash of the President of the United States the investigation would cease and the wrongdoers would escape.

For my part I resent such imputation, and I believe that it is due to the Senate and due to the members of this committee that I ask the chairman of the investigating committee whether the matter contained in the publication which I have had read at the desk is true or false. The country has a right to know whether this information tends to a sound public opinion or tends to pervert and mislead it, and I have risen with these preliminary observations to ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina whether the statements contained in the article are true or false.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this article is not justified by the facts in the case. The newspaper reporter jumped at a conclusion and made a wrong conclusion from what I suppose he saw.

My meeting with the President on the day he was at the Capitol was by the purest accident. I did not know that he was coming to the Capitol. I did not know he was here. I received no message from him to come to see him. I happened to be in the room of my Committee on Rules and my secretary came over and told me that the Secretary of Commerce had ordered a lightship from the Knuckles, on Frying Pan Shoals, near Wilmington, 30 miles at sea, in defiance of the law, as I claimed. It made me mad. I had been to see him and told him how his predecessor had made a similar order, but reversed it himself, because the law directed that he should put the lightship on that particular spot. He said, "I would like to change it, but I can not fly in the teeth of Congress."

I then heard that the President was in the Capitol. I went to the President and said, "I desire, Mr. President, to appeal from one of your Cabinet officers to you," and I stated the circumstances. When just leaving him I talked something about the Mulhall charges. He expressed a desire that the "lobby" investigation should go on.

Now, I will state what I think is the way the newspaper man jumped at this conclusion: I had accepted an invitation to make a speech on the Fourth of July in North Carolina, and had announced to the reporters that I had taken authority to postpone the hearing until Tuesday of next week, the 8th. In talking with my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, he told me that it would be very unwise for me to leave. I wanted to go home and spend a few days with my family before going into a distant part of the State to make this speech. My colleague thought it unwise for me to leave, because he differed with me in my opinion as to when we would close up our caucus action. So he was right and I was wrong.

In talking upon this matter with one of my colleagues, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who boards at the same hotel that I do—I believe I talked with only one of them, for there was no concerted action—I said, "Suppose we close up this New York matter and all evidence taken under the Norris resolution before we begin Tuesday to consider the Sugar and the Wool Trust and the Mulhall business." We agreed that that was all right, and I called a meeting, and was notified by Mr. Ledyard and Mr. Cravath that they could come at any time. They are here to-day, and I think we shall finish up with them to-day.

That is about what happened. There is no justification for what the Senator says. All this talk about—

President Wilson yesterday went to the Capitol and gave the speed gear of the lobby committee a vigorous turn—

And that—

President Wilson thought this an unusual delay—

is simply the imagination of the reporter. None of that happened. We talked about the Mulhall charges. I was not with the President exceeding five minutes, but he did express a desire that we go on and get through with this "lobby" business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has attached altogether too much significance to what the newspapers have said concerning the suspension of the work of the lobby investigating committee. Of course, if we should stop to analyze and notice everything that thus appears, apparently without authority at all, we would consume all of the time of the Senate in the consideration of such matters. No one suggests that this was in the nature of an inspired interview such as appeared in the newspapers giving rise to the examination in the first instance.

It was, as a matter of course, entirely proper on the part of the distinguished Senator from Iowa to put upon the records of the Senate the reasons which gave rise to the suspension of the work of the lobby investigating committee. There is no secret about it. The public press advised the country when the suspension took place what the occasion for it was, and it was at all times the intention of the committee to resume work immediately the Democratic members thereof should be free from the duties that called them to attend the caucus.

The distinguished Senator from the State of Iowa shares with the President the honor of having initiated this inquiry, the revelations of which have been of so startling a character. They have not only fully justified the President in any strictures he may have made in the article which gave rise to the investigation, but they have been of so grave a character as to challenge the attention of the entire country. It awaits with no small degree of eagerness information concerning the details concerning the sinister influences which have in the past operated to induce legislation and which may be more or less operative at the present time.

The President simply reflects the sentiment generally prevailing that no longer delay should ensue than the necessities of the case actually require, and that the members of the committee even subordinate other duties to the necessities of carrying on this investigation without delay. Everybody recognizes that it was started with a view to ascertain what influences were operative in connection with pending tariff legislation.

A few days ago all the members of the committee, recognizing that it was desirable to proceed without delay, concluded that the caucus would complete its work last night and that there would then be an opportunity to resume this morning. The caucus did not do so, but the Democratic members of the committee have chosen rather to go on with the work of the investigation than to continue with the work of the caucus.

I think it altogether commendable in the President to indicate, if he did so indicate, that it was perhaps desirable even that other duties should be subordinated and that the investigation should go on, in order that reports of its hearings might be available for the purpose for which the investigation was originally started, namely, to ascertain what influences, if any influences there were, were at work in connection with the tariff legislation that is soon to engage the attention of the Senate.

WASHED PAPER MONEY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on several occasions during the past month I have endeavored to have printed as a public document numerous letters I have received on the subject of washed paper money. I have failed in that, and I desire now to read a couple of short editorials on the subject, which I think are very pertinent. With the permission of the Senate, I will first read an editorial from the Washington Post of July 2, 1913, headed "Washed-out money." It is as follows:

WASHED-OUT MONEY.

The specimens of washed money which are beginning to appear in circulation are an imposition upon the patience and good taste of the people. The pittance that may be saved by washing the money is more than offset by the danger of counterfeiting. Who can tell whether a bill is good or not, when the ink is so faded as to make the print illegible? The experiment, judging by the appearance of the bills, is a miserable failure. The Treasury authorities should either see that all washed bills are up to a certain standard, or abolish the new system altogether. Uncle Sam is not so poor that he can not furnish attractive money for the public, and there should be no picayunish economy that will lower the standard already attained.

Further, I read from the American Banker of May 24, 1913, as follows:

WASHED BILLS AND COUNTERFEITS.

There is a widespread alarm over the probability that the Government laundry will give a tremendous impetus to counterfeiters. Of necessity, the cleansing of a bill takes out some of the color, and so is a partial bleaching process. Crooks engaged in the green-goods business have no difficulty in getting paper of the precise kind used in the production of genuine bills, and while their laundry does not work quite so fast as Uncle Sam, it works full time just the same, and the output of spurious money is liable to reach dangerous proportions.

When the plant for washing soiled bills was first put in operation, bankers warned Government officials that this was a dangerous innovation. Despite this protest, however, the authorities went ahead and increased the capacity of the plant. This was nuts and oranges for the crooks who were steadily increasing their output of green goods which can scarcely be distinguished from the genuine article, even by experts.

Something must be done to root out the counterfeiting gang, but this process, it is feared, will be made more difficult by the large increase in the volume of washed money now coming into circulation.

I have still another editorial on the same subject, taken from the Washington Post, which I shall not read but shall ask to have published in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Editorial printed in the Washington Post May 15, 1913.]

COUNTERFEIT CERTIFICATES.

The appearance in general circulation of counterfeit silver certificates printed on official paper, which are so perfectly executed that experts frequently fail to detect their spurious character, goes to justify the fears of the banks that the Treasury's money-washing laundry would give an impetus to counterfeiting.

The washing process as practiced at the Treasury takes as little of the color out of the bills as is compatible with cleanliness of appearance, but quite naturally the fact that washing the money had the effect of bleaching it to a certain extent suggested the idea to counterfeiters that a more thorough bath would put them in possession of a good supply of paper that would pass examination everywhere. As it is rather easy in these days of scientific imitation of engraving, processes and ink making to turn out "green goods" of the proper color, tint, and mechanical perfection, a stock in hand of the virtually inimitable paper is nine-tenths of the battle. Making a $5 bill grow where $1 grew before is simpler, indeed, than making two blades enrich the farmer where one had kept him in debt. The practical immunity from detection is another advantage which commends the new process to the dextrous crook with an aversion for prison life.

The Treasury took the bankers' warning so little to heart that plans for increasing its capacity were carried out, so that now several times as much soiled money can be given a presentable appearance as formerly. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the bill raisers should increase their output in the same ratio, or at all. Doubtless their laundry facilities permit them to take bills in the original green and bleach them to any degree of whiteness wanted.

That the rascals are still at large despite the traps set by the secret service affords an additional cause for alarm, and the adoption of precautions calculated to put an end to such an infringement on the Treasury's exclusive right of production and distribution of the genuine "long green." If subtreasuries and banks do not find it possible to separate the good from the bad, it is conceivable that the proportion of spurious currency in circulation may become a public menace.

PROPOSED LAKE ERIE DAM.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, a few days since the President of the United States transmitted to the Senate a report of the International Waterways Commission relative to the construction of a proposed dam at the outlet of Lake Erie, which I understand was ordered to be printed. There accompanied the report some illustrations in the nature of plate maps. Under the rule of the Senate it requires a special order to have the illustrations printed with the report. I will state that the matter has been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, and I am speaking for the committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the accompanying illustrations be printed with the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the President of the United States in transmitting the report made the recommendation which I read:

> Should Congress make provision for the printing of such report as a document the American section of the commission requests that 500 copies thereof be made available for its use.

In pursuance to that suggestion I offer the order I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia submits an order, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That 500 copies of the message from the President of the United States, transmitting the final report of the International Waterways Commission upon the proposed dam at the outlet of Lake Erie (S. Doc. 118, 63d Cong., 1st sess.), be printed, with accompanying illustrations, and delivered to the American section of the International Waterways Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one question. Has the Senator an estimate of the cost of printing the 500 copies?

Mr. BACON. The order does not call for an extra 500 copies.

Mr. SMOOT. They are to come out of the number heretofore ordered printed?

Mr. BACON. It only specifies that that number shall be delivered as indicated, but it does not ask for an increase in the number ordered printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the order will be entered.

ST. LOUIS, BROWNSVILLE & MEXICO RAILROAD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 125) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission, in connection with its investigation of all the facts and circumstances concerning the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. and the subsequent receivership of both railroads, as heretofore ordered by resolution of the Senate, also investigate, if it has not the evidence on hand, and report to the Senate all the facts and circumstances concerning the purchase of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railroad in the State of Texas by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., such information to contain the total cost, directly and indirectly, of the purchase of said St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad and the method by which same was acquired and the person or persons to whom the purchase price thereof was paid, or who, directly or indirectly, participated in such sale or were benefited thereby, including the total cost of construction of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railroad and the total amount and value of donations or bonuses contributed in cash or otherwise in consideration of or as an inducement to the construction of said road, the amount paid to all persons, firms, or corporations in consideration of the construction of said railroad, or any part thereof, and the names of any and all persons who were interested in contracts for such construction or who participated in or were benefited by such contracts, directly or indirectly, and any and all other facts tending to show what profit was derived, directly or indirectly, by any and all persons from the construction, operation, or sale of said St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railroad and by whom derived, and whether, since the construction of said railroad, its operation has been profitable or unprofitable, and, if unprofitable, the reasons therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has entered upon this investigation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has entered upon the investigation, and this resolution does not enlarge the scope of the investigation. It simply directs particular attention to this one transaction in Texas. I think it would be of value to bring out the facts suggested in the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. The question I was asking the Senator was not with reference to this particular resolution, but the resolution heretofore passed. I understand there was passed some time ago a Senate resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the investigation referred to. Was there not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; it covers the matter described in my resolution only in very general terms, however. My idea was to direct particular attention to this transaction in the State of Texas.

Mr. NORRIS. But can the Senator tell us how far the investigation has progressed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator remember the date when the other resolution was passed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was something like three or four weeks ago, I am sure.

Mr. NORRIS. It was a Senate resolution, was it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. A Senate resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONER M'CHORD (S. DOC. 119).

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have printed as a Senate document an address by Hon. C. C. McChord, Interstate Commerce Commissioner, before the Association of Iron, Steel, and Electrical Engineers on the work of the Federal Government for the prevention of railroad accidents and its results.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to ask the Senator the length of the address and what it will cost to print it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know its length, but I know it covers the subject very fully. I did not undertake to count the pages, because it is a subject of such importance that the lengthier it is the better.

Mr. CHILTON. Usually these matters are attended to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I do not see either Senator present.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the whole of the address in the paper sent to the desk?

Mr. BORAH. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there is no question but that it can be printed within the amount provided by law.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the address will be printed as a Senate document.

OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the country to a matter of interest to us all.

In 1908 a joint resolution was passed by Congress authorizing the Department of Justice to institute proceedings of forfeiture against the Oregon & California Railroad Co. Those proceedings were instituted, and resulted in a judgment of forfeiture against the company. Subsequently an act was passed by Congress to withdraw the lands forfeited from sale, settlement, or other disposition until subsequent legislation was had by Congress. Notwithstanding that act, there are agents in the field, throughout the West particularly, selling what purport to be preferred rights to the lands within this grant, although it is not possible for any person to sell preferred rights to them. The result is that through these representations many innocent people are being separated from their money.

Mr. SMOOT. And they are paying from $200 to $500 each.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are paying from $200 to $500 for each quarter section. I am constantly in receipt of letters from the Pacific coast, from the Middle West, and some from the East asking me whether or not parties can secure preferred rights to lands within the grant.

Some time ago, not knowing the present status of the suit, I sent to the district attorney at Portland, Oreg., a letter I had received from a man named B. C. Smith, at Carlton, Oreg., asking the status of the forfeiture proceedings and whether he could acquire preferred rights. In answer to Mr. Smith, the district attorney addressed to him a letter explaining the present status of the forfeiture proceedings; and in addition to writing Mr. Smith the district attorney sent me a copy of his letter. I ask to have the letter read and inserted in the RECORD in order that so far as it is possible for Congress to protect these innocent people and prevent others from imposing on them it may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNE 10, 1913.

Mr. B. C. SMITH, Carlton, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN has referred to me for attention and reply your valued communication of May 29, 1913, in which you make inquiry concerning the present status of the case of the United States v. Oregon & California Railroad Co., and you also ask information as to the manner in which these lands may be acquired by actual settlement thereon.

Replying thereto, you are advised that in the above suit the district court has rendered a decision canceling the patent of the defendant corporation on the ground that the defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to comply with the terms of the grant under which it took and accepted the same. It is understood that the defendant will appeal this case to the circuit court of appeals, and it is contemplated that before the decision shall become final that it will be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is very difficult for us to hazard an opinion as to when the probable final outcome of this case will be, but, under ordinary circumstances, a decision could not reasonably be expected within two years.

In the event that the decision of our district court should be upheld by the Supreme Court, then it will be necessary for Congress to provide by legislation for some manner for the disposal of these lands. It is my opinion that until the case is finally determined and Congress thereafter by legislation provides some method for the disposal of these lands, that it is impossible for any citizen to gain any rights by attempting to acquire them. In this connection I would most urgently advise you not to permit any locator to induce you to pay him any sum of money or any other consideration for locating you upon any of these lands. There are certain people who are now making a business of locating alleged settlers on these lands, charging them a fee therefor, claiming in some instances to have authority for so doing. This office looks with disapproval upon the methods of these men, and it is my opinion that those citizens who pay these alleged locators their fees will simply lose the amount they so pay.

If there is any other information that you desire and that I am in position to furnish you, I assure you that I will be glad to do so upon your request therefor.

Yours, very truly,

CLARENCE L. REAMES,
United States Attorney.

SESSION TO-MORROW AND ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until to-morrow at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I desire a unanimous-consent agreement, if possible, to the effect that no business of a legislative or executive character shall be transacted to-morrow, it being the purpose to meet to-morrow simply that we may adjourn over until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given.

LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING BUREAU.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill S. 1240, to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of proceeding to the consideration of the bill will say "aye." [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

There were on a division—ayes 17, noes 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll to determine the presence of a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Myers	Sheppard

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. NELSON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate. I will let that statement stand for the roll calls of the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the Chamber to-day. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is necessarily absent from the city. I desire this announcement to stand for any roll call hereafter during the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1240.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I understand that the consideration of the bill is likely to lead to some debate. I realize that my colleagues are desirous of returning to the consideration of matters in conference. For that reason I shall not insist upon the consideration of the bill at this time if the Senator from New Hampshire is going to debate the matter or to obstruct it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it is my purpose to debate the bill somewhat when it is up for consideration. If it is to be seriously considered, I shall offer amendments to it. I think there is opposition to the measure on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill in view of the fact that it will lead to debate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 3, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 2, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father almighty, ever patient and kind, just and merciful, wise and good, we come to Thee with mingled feelings of sorrow and regret, joy and gratitude—sorrow and regret for our past mistakes and sins, joy and gratitude for the auspicious conditions of the present, the hopes and promises for our future. To-day the sun shines on a reunited people, the Stars and Stripes float peacefully over the land. The din of strife, the roar of battle is over, and the men who met in deadly conflict 50 years ago on a great battle field have met in fraternity and good will, rejoicing in the victory for the blue and the victory for the gray—a scene unparalleled in history, one upon which Thou canst look with approval. Grant that its lesson may sink deep into our hearts and be the earnest of an everlasting peace among ourselves and with all nations. This we ask in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 28, 1913, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. W. N. BALTZ, a Member elect from the State of Illinois, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman, Saturday being the day after the Fourth of July and most Members probably intending to go out of town, whether we can not have an understanding that there will be no business whatever transacted upon Saturday except to provide for the date of the next meeting of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think that that arrangement could be made, that there would be no business transacted upon Saturday except to adjourn over for three days.

Mr. MANN. Why not ask unanimous consent now that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on whatever day the gentleman desires to suggest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On Wednesday. I have no objection to putting that into the request, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next, and that when it adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on the following Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. That is all that is necessary, and we can have an understanding as to the rest of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next, and that when the House adjourns on Saturday next it adjourn to meet the following Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he means by that arrangement to cut off unanimous consents on Saturday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The suggestion was made that, as it is the day following the Fourth of July and as a great many Members desire to leave town, there be an understanding that there would be no business done, so that Members who wish to go away would not feel the necessity of being here upon that day.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that; but the gentleman will remember that the previous arrangement was made that nothing but unanimous-consent matters should come up until July 14. Does the gentleman now propose to eliminate unanimous consents on Saturday?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is involved in the agreement.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was that the idea of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. The reason I raised the question was to see if we could have an understanding that there would be no business of any kind transacted on Saturday.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there might be some resolution reported on Saturday. It is not certain that there will not be, and I think it is better not to have that agreement.

Mr. MANN. What would be the resolution that would be reported on Saturday?

Mr. HENRY. I do not know that there will be one, but there might be.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Committee on Rules might report a resolution, but it is safe to say that it will not be acted upon on Saturday.

Mr. HENRY. And it is safe to say that the gentleman's request will not be granted to-day.

Mr. MANN. But I am making no request. I never made a request of the gentleman from Texas, knowing that he would not oblige me.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman is mistaken about that; but the gentleman is not running the House.

Mr. MANN. I certainly am not held responsible for running the gentleman from Texas; thank God for that.

Mr. HENRY. And nobody seems to be responsible for the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The request is only to adjourn until Saturday.

Mr. HENRY. I do not object to that, but I do object to saying that there would be no business transacted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not said that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. It should be understood that that request was to adjourn until Saturday, in the first instance, and then to adjourn from Saturday until the following Wednesday.

Mr. HENRY. Does that request include not to transact any business on Saturday?

The SPEAKER. The order has already been made.

Mr. HENRY. But what was the order?

The SPEAKER. The order is that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Saturday, and that when it meets on next Saturday it adjourn to meet on the following Wednesday.

Mr. HENRY. That does not interfere with business that might be transacted?

The SPEAKER. The truth about it is that if every gentleman present were to agree that a thing should not be done on Saturday or Wednesday, and another gentleman who was not present came in he would not be bound by that agreement. It is what is called a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. HENRY. I want to say I do not object to the House adjourning to-day until next Saturday and then adjourning Saturday to Wednesday, but I shall object to cutting Members out from presenting some important matter on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman from Texas had ample time to make objection and he did not do it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I was trying to understand what the Chair stated and the Chair certainly would not object to our understanding a statement from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made the statement twice.

Mr. HENRY. The Speaker does not hold, then, that that would preclude the transaction of business?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has just stated that if every Member present were to agree that there should not be a thing done after the Chaplain got through praying on Saturday it would not bind anybody who is not here.

Mr. HENRY. I do not want it to bind me.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair is not certain it would bind anybody. Of course it is one of those agreements people live up to as a matter of honor. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I was trying to understand——

The SPEAKER. Certainly, the Chair did not intend any reflection upon the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. I understand the Speaker did not, but, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to understand the agreement between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York and at times the conversation was so low I did not catch every word.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to say before the Speaker had announced the unanimous consent, as far as I know, that I had addressed the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Why, the Chair put that question twice and nobody seemed to be disposed to say a word and the Chair announced that there was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I did not so understand it.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2272. An act providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 1917. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday there appeared an article in the New York World containing certain statements of Mr. Mulhall, and then certain statements of the newspaper touching those statements of Mulhall. Among other things appears this:

That among the men whom the lobbyists of this association had no difficulty in reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons during recent years were President Taft; Senator Lodge; the late Vice President Sherman; ex-Senator Foraker; Senator Nelson; ex-Senator Hemenway, ex-Speaker Cannon; ex-Congressman Dwight, Republican "whip" of the House from 1909 to 1911; former Congressman James E. Tawney, of Minnesota; former Congressman Adam Bede, of Minnesota; Senator Isaac Stephenson, of Wisconsin; former Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Senator Townsend, of Michigan; Senator Gallinger, of New Hampshire; Congressman Webb, of North Carolina; former Congressman J. Sloat Fassett, of New York; former Congressman W. B. McKinley, of Illinois; former Congressman Vreeland, of New York; former Congressman Dalzell, of Pennsylvania; former Senator N. B. Scott, of West Virginia; former Congressman W. S. Bennet, of

New York; former Postmaster General James A. Gary, of Baltimore; the late Congressman George A. Southwick, of New York; Congressman W. M. Calder, of New York; Congressman James F. Burke, of Pennsylvania; former Congressman W. H. Ryan, of New York; former Congressman W. M. Wilson, of Illinois; former Congressman Denby, of Michigan; former Congressman Edward H. Henshaw, of Nebraska; former Congressman Jesse Overstreet, of Indiana; former Congressman J. G. Beale, of Pennsylvania; former Congressman W. A. Calderhead, of Kansas; former Congressman Diekema, of Michigan; former Congressman M. A. Driscoll, of New York; former Congressman G. J. Foster, of Vermont; former Congressman P. M. Fowler, of New Jersey; Congressman Swagar Sherley, of Kentucky; former Congressman J. A. Sterling, of Illinois; former Congressman J. P. Swasey, of Maine; former Congressman Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine; Gov. W. T. Haines, of Maine; Ambassador Myron T. Herrick, of Ohio; Ambassador Curtis Guild, of Massachusetts; Richard Bartholdt, of Missouri; the late Congressman Sidney Mudd, of Maryland; and Congressman George W. Fairchild, of the thirty-fourth New York district.

Mr. Speaker, this part of the article that I have read starts with the statement:

That among the men whom the lobbyists of this association had no difficulty in reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons during recent years were—

Naming those whom I have just read. I do not know what was intended to be conveyed by the language, "In reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons," but I do know that a public man should be zealous of his honor, and I am unwilling to pass over in silence any statement that by inference or by innuendo can be construed in any way as a reflection upon my conduct as the Representative of the people of my district in the Congress of the United States.

I have been conscious of my own rectitude of purpose. To my knowledge I have never seen—I do not know—Mr. Mulhall, and if this statement undertakes to impute in any way that I have ever been influenced or reached or corruptly controlled, or controlled in any way, by this national association or anybody else, in regard to my conduct as a Representative in this House, I brand it as a malicious, wanton, deliberate lie.

I would stop with what I have said if the matter rested here alone. I would be willing to leave to my colleagues, who have known me for 10 years past and have served with me, the judgment of the whole matter. I am willing to let them speak as to my character; but, unfortunately, these statements go beyond the mere acquaintanceship that any man may have, public or private. I do not believe, therefore, that a charge of this kind should be passed over in silence, and I have therefore prepared, and now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of, the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears that on the 29th day of June, 1913, there was published in the World, a newspaper of the city of New York, the following statement, viz:

"7. That among the men whom the lobbyists of this association (meaning thereby the National Association of Manufacturers) had no difficulty in reaching and influencing for business, political, or sympathetic reasons during recent years were: President Taft, Senator Lodge, the late Vice President Sherman, ex-Senator Foraker, Senator Nelson, ex-Senator Hemenway, ex-Speaker Cannon, ex-Congressman Dwight, Republican "whip" of the House from 1909 to 1911; former Congressman James E. Tawney, of Minnesota; former Congressman J. Whereas said statement reflects upon the official character and conduct of Representative SWAGAR SHERLEY, a Member of this House, who has requested an investigation by this body, in accordance with the rules and practices of the House, of the matters so alleged concerning him:

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of seven Members of the House, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into the matters so alleged concerning the said Representative, and more especially whether, during this or any previous Congress of which the said Representative was a Member, the lobbyists of the said National Association of Manufacturers, or the said association itself, through any officer, agent, or member thereof, did, in fact, reach or influence, whether for business, political, or sympathetic reasons, or otherwise, the said Representative in and about the discharge of his official duties; and if so, when, by whom, and in what manner. And for such purposes the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, to be immediately available.

Mr. HENRY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WEBB, Mr. CALDER, and Mr. J. I. NOLAN rose.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will recognize all gentlemen, but he can not recognize them all at once.

Mr. HENRY. Then I refrain from making any remarks at this time, but I simply reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] reserves the right to object.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I wish to amend the resolution by adding after the word "SHERLEY," the name of "E. Y. WEBB."

The SPEAKER. An amendment is not in order until unanimous consent has been obtained.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, what I wanted to say is this—and I might as well say it now.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] or any other gentleman to offer an amendment, the gentleman from North Carolina first, after unanimous consent is had to consider the resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I have implicit confidence in the integrity of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], and have not the slightest objection to an investigation. But this is a very important resolution. The subject matter of this investigation is wide-reaching, and the House should proceed with great caution and deliberation. I believe that an investigation should be had into these broadside charges that have been made, and I believe that this resolution, along with others introduced, should be referred to the appropriate committee, as one resolution has already been, where they can be deliberately considered and reported at the appropriate time.

We do not want to make any undue haste in this matter, but the resolution should be broad enough and the power should be great enough to go to the bottom of the allegations, and let us have a real investigation of the charges and alleged facts. For that reason I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment his objection?

Mr. HENRY. I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the resolution correctly—and I am not sure that I did—it provided only for a committee to investigate the charges against the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. May I ask for information on that point?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I purposely limited the resolution to myself, because I felt that I should take the initiative only for myself in this matter, leaving to anyone else to take whatever course they might see fit or the House to take what course it might see fit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated in the newspapers that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] would introduce a resolution providing for an investigating committee. I had supposed that the resolution which he would introduce would provide for the appointment of a committee which might make a thorough investigation of these charges, and I somewhat regret, although I do not at all criticize, the undue modesty of the gentleman from Kentucky in providing in his resolution only for the investigation of the charges against himself.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] had looked at the matter in the way that the rest of us do, he would have known that so far as he was concerned no investigation was needed, at least to assure the Members of this House of his absolute integrity and honesty [applause] and his constant and continued fidelity to public duty. The gentleman from Kentucky probably needs no defense in his own district, and yet it is due to him and others that charges of this kind, rather lightly made and published by papers not too scrupulous, scattered over the United States as these charges have been, should be investigated. It is due to him and to others, and it is due to this House and it is due to our form of government, that these charges be investigated.

Most of the gentlemen named in the list are men illustrious in the history of their country. No one who knows these men believes that they have been influenced by corrupt motives or that any professional or other lobbyist has been able to crack the whip over their heads or unduly or improperly influence them. Under the very nature of the duties which we perform, a Member of Congress must receive information from men who offer it to him. It is one of the duties of our office to keep in touch with the people of the country and with public sentiment. I do not believe that Congress is often influenced by these lobbyists, who sometimes come to Washington pretending to have influence over this man or that man, selecting one side or the other for different individuals, knowing that in the end Members must answer either yea or nay, and it is an even guess which he can make. We ought, however, to investigate the charges. We ought to meet this libel promptly, and we ought to meet it completely. I do not believe that the people have lost confidence in their representatives or in the representative form of government, and we ought to stamp on these methods, pursued by those who either seek pay for lying or reputation or notoriety for publishing lies. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK, Mr. J. I. NOLAN, and Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask whether this resolution requires unanimous consent for its consideration, or whether it is a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think it is a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard on that before the Chair rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, while this resolution is pending, to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, when I first entered public life I resolved that I would never cast a vote that I could not defend from my conscience and explain satisfactorily to the good people who honor me with their suffrages. That resolve has been scrupulously kept. I have done my public duty honestly, ofttimes differing with my friends and colleagues, but at no time in my public career have I ever voted except from the highest and purest motives.

If a contrary conclusion may be drawn from the insinuation against me and the long list of honorable men mentioned by Mr. Mulhall as being easy to reach and sympathetically influenced in behalf of the organization he once represented, I am happy in the belief that there is not in my great district a man, woman, or child, white or black, Republican or Democrat, who would give credence to such insinuation for the fractional part of a second; and I have universal assurance that my associates in this House regard me in the same light. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that any man should place me among the sympathizers and friends of the National Association of Manufacturers, for it so happens that I have never voted for their position on a single one of the great questions that have been before the House. I never knew a single member or officer as such of this association; I do not suppose there are a dozen members of the association in my district; I do not know even that there is one, and I would not know Mr. Mulhall if I should see him to-day. I have not a labor union in my entire district, and yet it so happens that in legislation so far I have always taken labor's side, both by my activities and votes.

Were not Mr. Mulhall's insinuations so completely refuted by my whole record in Congress, in committee, and in my district as to make them absurd and ridiculous, I would be afraid to trust myself to speak of him.

Suffice it to say that any statement, suggestion, intimation, insinuation, or innuendo to the effect that I have ever been influenced to corruptly or improperly vote on any question is a falsehood of the basest and wickedest dye. [Applause.]

And, therefore, conscious of the rectitude of my public career, I join in the demand that such insinuations shall be investigated in order that honest men may be protected and the guilty, if any, exposed. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. NEELEY. To offer a substitute for the resolution.

The SPEAKER. We have not reached that stage yet. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. In an issue of the New York World, Sunday, June 29, there appears an interview with Martin M. Mulhall which dealt with his work as agent for the National Association of Manufacturers. In one part of the story Mr. Mulhall refers to a number of gentlemen, including former President William H. Taft, the late Vice President James S. Sherman, ex-Members of Congress, and several Members of this body, including myself, as being easily reached through business, political, or sympathetic influences—he places my name among this number. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this statement stood by itself, I doubt if I would dignify it by making any statement on this floor; but he couples with his statement a reflection on other gentlemen, which necessarily requires a thorough and complete investigation, and as it is apt to cause in the public mind a suspicion that Members of Congress generally are open to questionable influences I therefore rise in my place to-day to say I do not know Mulhall, would not know him if I saw him, and never conferred with him in Washington or any other place regarding legislative matters or any other thing. Furthermore, while I undoubtedly have answered many letters from the National Association of Manufacturers relative to legislative matters, I have never conferred with any of its officers here in Washington on any subject in which they were interested. Relative to my being readily reached through political, business, or sympathetic influences, it is a fact that I have more often voted in opposition to things this association desired than otherwise, notably the anticompulsory pilotage bill, which I voted against and which this association strongly advocated; the eight-hour workday, whether as a separate measure or a rider to an appropriation bill, I have always voted for; and this association opposed the Clayton bill passed by the last House, which provided a jury trial in labor contempt cases, which this association very vigorously fought and I voted for. There is one measure which I now recall that the National Association of Manufacturers strongly opposed and with which I agreed with them, namely, the attempt to amend the sundry civil bill so as to exempt labor organizations from prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act. I have voted against this whenever it was up, and did so without regard to this association or any other association or individual.

That I have always been easy to reach at any time for any proper cause by any man, woman, or organization since I have been a Member of Congress is certainly true, but that this man, or any man, or any organization has ever used me for any cause or secured my vote in any way for anything that I did not deem to be for the best interests of all the people I only deny for the benefit of those who do not know me and might accept the cowardly reference of this man.

While Mr. Mulhall made no statement that he or anyone else representing the National Association of Manufacturers contributed to any of my campaigns, I want to take this opportunity to say that at no time since I have been a Representative in Congress has this association or any association of like character been asked or have they offered to or have they contributed to any of my campaigns, nor have they distributed literature in my district. In this connection I might state that in the campaign of 1910 a letter was sent to every registered voter of my district signed by Samuel Gompers and purporting to come from the American Federation of Labor, seeking to defeat me because of my vote against the Hughes amendment to the sundry civil bill in the Sixty-first Congress, which sought to exempt labor organizations from prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act. Although this letter was sent out by the American Federation of Labor, I did not ask nor did the National Association of Manufacturers offer to send any literature into my district to counteract its effects.

Mr. Speaker, I join in the request that unanimous consent be given to the immediate appointment of a committee to thoroughly investigate the charges made by this man to the end that the people of this country may know if any men in this House have received money, directly or indirectly, as campaign contributions or as compensation for services from the National Association of Manufacturers or from any other association, and to demonstrate whether or not representatives of the people can readily be reached through political or business influences by this or any other association.

I have served in five successive Congresses and have never permitted any man to reflect on my integrity, and have cherished keenly the reputation I have enjoyed here and elsewhere for uprightness, and I am anxious that this matter be probed to the very bottom. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution. He did not present it as a privileged matter. Afterwards the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] suggested that it was a privileged matter. Is the matter now under consideration the question of privilege or the request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The matter under consideration is the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask who made the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] made a parliamentary inquiry. The whole situation is this: The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] reserved a point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. He reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Yes; he reserved the right to object.

Mr. HENRY. I reserved a point of order, too.

The SPEAKER. He reserved the right to object. Then these gentlemen whose names are in this list—one or two of them—rose. The next step was that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] made a parliamentary inquiry, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] wanted to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Massachusetts did make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts made a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it was privileged or not, and the Chair intimated, in a tentative sort of way, that it seemed to him as though it was privileged, although the Chair did not decide it absolutely; and then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] said he wanted to be heard on that parliamentary proposition.

Before he got started the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asked unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. That was granted. When he had finished, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] asked unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for five minutes, which request was granted. The gentleman from Texas will be recognized on the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the Speaker takes the parliamentary inquiry made by the gentleman from Massachusetts to be equivalent to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. Oh, the Chair thinks so.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the parliamentary status is this: That there is an answer to a parliamentary inquiry pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that very nearly states the case. In any event, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] said that he wanted to be heard upon the parliamentary proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that that question has never yet been presented to the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] merely asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution. No one has yet appeared upon this floor to offer the resolution as a matter of privilege. Until that does occur, there is no question raised that the Speaker is called upon to rule upon or on which he can rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the question for unanimous consent first, and if anyone objects, then we will go into the other question.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair puts that question, I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is mistaken in supposing that I have not the right to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not say that.

Mr. GARDNER. The reason that I propounded a parliamentary inquiry at this time is owing to the fact that the response of many Members to that question of unanimous consent will depend on the answer to the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I quite concede the gentleman was within his rights in making the inquiry and that of course the Speaker properly answered him, but at the same time the parliamentary status is that we have not yet gotten to that stage of the proceedings.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution, then this inquiry into the Mulhall charges proceeds on the proposition as to the gentleman from Kentucky alone. If some one does object to his request for unanimous consent, then all matters of inquiry would go to the Committee on Rules and this inquiry would be broadened, as it ought to be broadened.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet decided whether it is a matter of privilege.

Mr. MURDOCK. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that no point of order has been made on the proposition of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. The gentleman from Massachusetts propounded a parliamentary inquiry. Barring that for the time, if the gentleman from Kentucky obtains unanimous consent, then the resolution is like any other resolution or proposition—open to amendment or substitution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, up to the present time the question as to whether the resolution is privileged or not could not be raised because the gentleman from Kentucky presented it by way of asking unanimous consent. If unanimous consent should be refused, then the gentleman should offer his resolution as a privileged resolution, and that would raise the question. The gentleman from Massachusetts made a parliamentary inquiry for the purpose of putting the House and the Speaker on notice.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state just a word. I have had no thought of the parliamentary status of the matter and I do not care to discuss that at this time. My whole purpose was to take the very first opportunity that presented itself to me, after this publication occurred, to bring it to the attention of Congress, that Congress might investigate the entire matter. I limited my resolution to myself, because it seemed to me that it was a proper thing for me to do. I am not the keeper of the conscience of any man but my own. I am perfectly willing to have the House investigate fully everything and everybody, but I am particularly anxious that so far as I am concerned there shall be no delay upon my part in letting the House and the country know that I am glad to have any sort of investigation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky believe in view of the fact that a great many people are involved, that this entire matter ought to be referred to the Committee on Rules with the understanding—let me finish—that that committee is to report as promptly as possible a resolution that will be broad enough to cover this entire subject which will insure a full and searching investigation into every phase of it that comes properly within the power of this House?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky has no opinion as to the method that shall be adopted or what the House shall do. The gentleman from Kentucky is anxious that action shall be taken to investigate the matters touching himself. I limited the resolution to that, because it did not seem to me that, being one named, in this matter I ought to move beyond myself, but I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall be amended in any form to make it as far-reaching as it is possible to make a resolution.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It being the evident desire of the House to have the committee when appointed with power to make investigation covering the charges against all the Members named in it, and probably others, and that desire having been repeatedly expressed, as it has on the floor, would not the gentleman himself ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I have no objection to that one way or the other.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will ask unanimous consent that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules with instructions to report to the House on Saturday——

Mr. MANN. I think it is proper for the gentleman from Kentucky to make the request. I do not think the House ought to appear to act in the matter contrary to the wishes of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I assumed when I offered my resolution in the form I did that it would be immediately considered and then amended, if any one wished to amend it, by including anybody else. I am simply anxious that the power be given to the House, and I am perfectly willing if it will bring that about to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules with the understanding that they are going to take the matter up and will report the matter at once.

Mr. HARDWICK. As promptly as possible.

The SPEAKER. The first thing is to put the question for unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has changed his request.

The SPEAKER. The request would be in the nature of a motion to refer——

Mr. MANN. Well, but the gentleman makes that as a unanimous-consent request——

Mr. HENRY. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a question of the highest privilege in this House and ought to be considered now.

Mr. MANN. It has not been presented in that form.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I present it in that form now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not present it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Permit me to make this statement——

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman can not get action that way, as we have not a quorum, and we have not one because of the deliberate understanding that nothing will be taken up until the 14th instant.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, it will look better to the country to make an amendment to the resolution to cover an investigation of every possible statement in the Mulhall charges. It would look like we were ready to take hold of it. An amendment has been prepared, I understand, by a gentleman here, and if it is not it can be stated, that will cover every proposition involved in these charges, and it would be better, to my thinking, to do this than to let it sleep a while in that committee. I remember distinctly my resolution governing or limiting lobbying that was introduced on the 10th, and it still sleeps in that committee, and yet we all know and we have known all the time that there was a necessity for limiting lobbying, and it occurs to me——

Mr. MANN. A necessity for limiting lying.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma (continuing). That we should take up this proposition now, and if this resolution is not broad enough, and I do not think it is, because it ought to cover the employees of this House as well and every person who is filling a public position, that can be done easily without any committee investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] that amendments offered in the House in this way, prepared hastily, and often believed sufficient to accomplish the purpose to-day in mind, in our experience frequently do not do so. In my opinion it is much better to let the Committee on Rules carefully and calmly prepare this resolution or amend and put it in such shape that it will include an investigation of everyone and of everybody who properly should be investigated by the House and report the resolution as promptly as possible. I do not believe that anyone imagines the Committee on Rules——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a second. I do not believe that anyone imagines the Committee on Rules or any other committee would delay the reporting of such a resolution. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want to state, if the gentleman will put the language he just used into the resolution as an amendment to it, it will cover everything the committee can do. When you say "every charge," that is pretty near all of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, 15 years of experience in this House makes me very doubtful as to whether the language I utter in this manner is sufficient to confer the authority required upon such a committee. I believe that other Members here who have had experience realize that this resolution should be taken by members of the Committee on Rules and examined and modified with sufficient care to make certain that what is proposed can be done without question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has spoken of the necessity of having a thorough investigation of not only men, but of things mentioned. Now, I have read the Mulhall charges in full, so far as they have been published, and they can be classified under three heads. He makes charges that Members of Congress were influenced in various ways. He makes charges, also, that committees of the House of Representatives were manipulated in their personnel for and against legislation; and he also makes the astonishing statement that the National Association of Manufacturers habitually sent spies into labor organizations, attempting to corrupt labor leaders, in order to affect labor legislation before this and the other body of Congress.

Now, I want to submit to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that unless the investigation is thorough, conducted under a resolution passed by the Committee on Rules; unless it goes into the matter of the personnel of Members of Congress, of the manipulation of committees, and also into this much greater field—the field of a dishonorable effort to discredit labor people in this country and labor generally—the investigation will not amount to much. I take it that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is in favor of an investigation that will cover this entire field, not only in regard to persons, but things.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] omits one thing which is of supreme importance in this House, affecting the integrity of its proceedings, and that is the charge that an employee of the House was in the pay of this Mulhall and used the pages of this House to spy upon the Members and to attempt to overhear conversations held in the House, in order to report their actions.

Mr. MURDOCK. I agree with the gentleman that is also important.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman to yield me three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not the time. I just made this additional statement, with the hope that the gentleman from Oklahoma and others would acquiesce in the suggestion that this matter be looked over by a committee.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Do I understand that the committee will bring in a report by Saturday?

Mr. HENRY. By Saturday, if possible.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. But not later than Wednesday of next week?

Mr. HENRY. No.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] reserves the right to object.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I think we are confronted with a situation that demands immediate action. I do not believe it is necessary to refer this resolution to any committee whatsoever. I do not believe that it will be to the interests of the people of the country or to the membership of this House that any delay should be had. In the 16 years which I have served in this House I have never seen an occasion when, in my judgment, the Members of the House ought to be more than ready to have immediate action. I understand the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] has prepared a careful resolution. It is a resolution which, in my judgment, is highly privileged, which could be heard now, and if it does not cover all the various phases of this situation it can be amended on the floor so as to do that. Therefore I hope that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will be withdrawn, and that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] may have an opportunity, as he can have, of course, if he desires it, to offer his resolution as a privileged resolution, which it undoubtedly is, because these charges attack the integrity of the Members of this House. It is absurd to say that such a resolution can not be perfected here and now. I hope that such a resolution will be perfected and acted upon, and that the country will know that the Members of this House do not desire delay for any purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, my whole iden has been to get action at the quickest possible moment. As one knowing the rules of this House, I believe that this matter is privileged. I presented it the other way because I never thought for an instant but that it would be acted upon immediately. Now, if it is privileged it is subject to any sort of amendment anybody may choose to offer and that the House may choose to adopt, and in order to bring it forward, in order that there may be action, I offer it as a privileged resolution of the House.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer it to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that that is not in order. The question before the House is the question of unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the whole matter. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] withdraws his request for unanimous consent and presents his resolution as a privileged resolution. It undoubtedly is a privileged resolution. That is what the Chair noted in the beginning, without any investigation about it. But since that the Chair has investigated it, and the precedents make it a question of privilege. It would be an astonishing thing, indeed, if charges that involve practically the whole House, more or less, should not be privileged, and the Chair entertains the resolution as a privileged resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves to refer this resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not debatable.

Mr. HENRY. It is debatable.

Mr. HAY. No; it is not.

Mr. HENRY. There is not the slightest doubt about its being debatable.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Virginia if he will withhold his point?

Mr. HAY. I will withhold it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious question that we have before the House, and no Member is more jealous of the prerogatives and the integrity of the membership than I am. I heartily approve every word that was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his remarks a few moments ago. I am anxious that we have a genuine investigation of this question.

Mr. Speaker, those who have undertaken to draw these resolutions know that one of the most difficult things to do is to draw a resolution for a sweeping investigation. You must cover every phase of the case in your allegations, and you must endow your committee with full power, else at every step you will be met by those who are opposed to the investigation, who will challenge you and say, "You have not the right to go into this question or that question," or "You have not the power to do this or that or the other," and they will take the case into the courts of this country.

Standing here as a Representative of my people in this House, I say that these startling, outrageous charges should be investigated by the membership in this body, and if it is found that Members should be exonerated——

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to his colleague [Mr. DIES]?

Mr. HENRY. In just one moment. If it is found that Members should be exonerated, let them be exonerated; and if it is found that Members of this body have been guilty of corruption and accepting bribes, they have no proper place in this House, and so should be expelled from our deliberations.

Now, let us approach this as becomes American citizens. Let us take the country into our confidence. Let this resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] go to the Committee on Rules, the appropriate committee. Let the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] introduce his resolution, and let it be referred there; and as the head and the spokesman of the committee, believing that my colleagues will agree with and cooperate with me, I pledge this House and the country that at the very earliest practicable date a resolution shall be brought into this body in order that we may have a genuine, thorough, and exhaustive investigation.

I hope the committee may get it here by Saturday. If we do not, we shall continue our deliberations until we can report an appropriate resolution, and protect the honor of the Members of this body.

Mr. DIES rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to his colleague [Mr. DIES]?

Mr. HENRY. With pleasure.

Mr. DIES. I want to ask the gentleman if the Congress resolves itself into a body to investigate every time some liar gets something into a newspaper about the integrity of a Member or Members of this body, how long does the gentleman think we will be in session here, delaying the consideration of the legitimate business of this country and the legislation which the people demand and expect at our hands?

Mr. HENRY. Only long enough to protect our integrity.

Mr. DIES. Against every liar who can get into the press?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, no; of course we do not have to take cognizance of all those things; but there is not a man on either side of this House who does not understand that these charges are of most serious import, and we can not afford to make a mistake now in our procedure and deliberations.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask the gentleman a question. If this resolution is referred to the Committee on Rules, does he think the Committee on Rules will confine it merely to those charges that relate to the integrity of Congressmen and the manipulation of committee appointments? There is a charge in these articles of a monstrous business conspiracy in this country. Will the gentleman include that in the scope of the investigation?

Mr. HENRY. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not hesitate to say that I think it should include all of these things, and that it will contain everything that should go into the resolution to protect the integrity of the House and uncover the lobbying that has been going on, and let the people know the facts underneath the whole transaction.

Mr. HENSLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman from Texas know any reason why we can not take up this resolution right here and now and perfect it just as well as the Rules Committee can take it up and consider it for some time?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I know a great many reasons. I know that when a resolution was introduced here to investigate Mr. Ballinger, Secretary of the Interior, we had this kind of a scene, and finally it was referred to the Committee on Rules, and they brought in a resolution that had the proper allegations and endowed the committee with proper power, and we had a genuine investigation. I know that these are not the proper pleadings for any court or tribunal. This is not the way to transact business of this sort. The rules require that every bill and resolution shall be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House; and if there was ever a time when the Committee on Rules should take a measure and consider it deliberately it is now. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will be invited before the committee. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will be invited there. Every Member who is interested in this question will be allowed to come and present his side of the case if he wants to, in order that the resolution may be properly drawn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman modify his motion so as to provide that the Committee on Rules shall report by Saturday?

Mr. HENRY. I think we had better do that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am willing.

Mr. HENRY. I modify it to that extent, that the committee be instructed to report by Saturday of this week.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if he has thought about this—I suggest it with some hesitation. I speak not only my own mind about it, but I think there are some other Members who feel somewhat as I do about the matter. We are all agreed here that the resolution which should finally be adopted should be much broader than the resolution presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. While we approve entirely of the course which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has pursued in presenting his resolution, yet we would not be satisfied to pass simply that resolution. It must be much broader than that. Now, as we all know, a committee of the Senate is already investigating. I take it that none of the Members of the House will be content to have the Senate committee investigate those charges particularly affecting the House Members. It is the duty of the House to protect the integrity of the House and to protect its own Members, but there are involved in the investigation that will inevitably come a number of other questions that do not affect the membership of the House alone that are incidental. If we have a House committee at the same time that the Senate committee is acting upon these incidental but very material questions there will inevitably be a great duplication of work, and I will say to the gentleman that if it could be worked out satisfactorily I am inclined to believe it would be a good thing if we were to follow a precedent set at least once before in an investigation and provide for a joint committee of the two bodies.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he would be willing to withdraw his motion to refer until such time as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] and myself and others that have amendments to this privileged question may introduce them for the consideration of the House?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman can introduce his resolution and it will be properly referred.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will call this to the attention of the gentleman, or attention has been called to the fact, that the resolution under consideration is not broad enough. There are some resolutions that have been prepared with great care that are broad and sweeping.

Mr. HENRY. They will go to the appropriate committee and be considered by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Would the gentleman object to their consideration at this time?

Mr. HENRY. I think they should be introduced regularly and go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I only ask the gentleman that he withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. HENRY. I have no desire to restrict the scope of this investigation, so far as I am concerned personally, and for all I know the gentleman's resolution might meet my concurrence at once, but I would not be prepared to take it up and consider it here now, nor would any other Member except the gentleman himself, perhaps.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. The gentleman can withhold his motion to refer until these resolutions are introduced and considered, and then he can judge as to whether they meet his desire.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Texas moves the previous question, will he grant me five minutes?

Mr. HENRY. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that debate on a motion to refer is confined to very narrow limits. The gentleman from Texas discussed the whole subject, but the Chair did not like to interrupt him. The precedents are that debate on motions to refer, and upon kindred motions, is confined within very narrow limits, and must be on the motion itself.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has already yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will prevail. There is no need of our getting panic-stricken and being afraid that somebody would say that we are going to let this thing rest in committee. Let people say that as much as they choose. The fact is that this resolution is coming out of committee, and that fact will be a complete answer to those charges, which we are always so much afraid of. That is one of the great troubles with this House. We have allowed muckrakers to make us panic-stricken.

I believe this matter should be investigated in its broadest sense, but more especially in reference to the charges made against Members of Congress. All of the rest may be very interesting, but what the country wants to know to-day is whether Congress is composed of a parcel of crooks, and that is what the country is going to watch for. That is what the country is going to look for in the headlines. We may magnify all these other incidental matters up to the sky, but they will not amount to a Hannah Cook, and I would just as leave have them investigated——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARDNER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GARDNER. I asked the gentleman to allow me to proceed, but I will yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not the gentleman say that the country is not only interested in the matter of finding out whether Congressmen are crooks, but that the country is also interested in finding out whether committees have been manipulated?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course he is.

Mr. GARDNER. But one of the reasons that the country thinks that Congressmen are crooks is because certain Congressmen go out on the Chautauqua circuit and say that we are crooks. [Applause and laughter.]

Because Congressmen repeat what they heard when they have not heard it, because Congressmen repeat that things are going on which we know are not going on, because men have not had the pluck, as Mr. SHERLEY has done, to stand up when a charge is made and say, "Investigate me." If the gentleman from Kentucky could only go to a civil court, instead of going before a body which the country may say is prejudiced—if he could only go before that civil court and say, "Hale that accuser before this court and make him prove his words before a body that will probably be prejudiced against me, SHERLEY," it would be well. Probably there is not a man in this Hall on whom the accusation of being subject to unrighteous influence more improperly falls than on the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. There is no man who less deserves that kind of an accusation than does Mr. SHERLEY. If he could go before a civil tribunal it would be better than going before a tribunal of Congressmen. But what I desire especially to call to the attention of the House is this: If we pass this resolution out of hand for political effect, because some gentlemen shout, we are panic-stricken. Now, put it in the hands of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and his associates, and they will bring it out in proper form. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. If the House adjourns until Saturday, and the committee of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is chairman reports, and somebody objects to unanimous consent at that time or raises the point of no quorum, would it go over until next Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. Why, it is bound to go over if there is no quorum present.

Mr. COOPER. That is what I wanted to get clearly before the House.

The SPEAKER. But if no gentleman raises the point, of course, the presumption is that there is a quorum here until somebody raises the point.

Mr. COOPER. There is no presumption when a case of this kind is before the House of Representatives. I have noticed that before.

The SPEAKER. There is always a presumption that a quorum is here.

Mr. COOPER. There is no presumption that somebody will not raise the point of no quorum promptly. Will the gentleman from Texas yield me three minutes?

Mr. HENRY. After I yield to——

Mr. GARDNER. May I ask the gentleman one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HENRY. I will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if, in his opinion, there is a quorum here at the present time? The House is at the mercy of anybody to make the point now as much as it would be on Saturday.

Mr. HENRY. From my cursory glance it seems to me as if there is a quorum here.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there is no quorum here.

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEELEY. Is it not a fact under the rule that we adopted that this resolution can not be reported before next Wednesday and considered in this House?

Mr. HENRY. No; I think not. That point was saved.

Mr. NEELEY. There is one thing that ought to be carefully considered in connection with this, Mr. Speaker, and that is that some of the witnesses may get away. Last Sunday morning, I am reliably informed, one of the persons accused or charged by Mr. Mulhall, made the statement that he had in one month received $900 as a part of the compensation for services that he had performed in spying upon Members of this House or of a previous House; that he had a record of the receipts and of the expenditures; and that they had better get him pretty quickly or that he would get out of this man's jurisdiction, for a boat went to South America every other day. Now, in view of that statement, it seems to me that the sooner we get at this matter the better off everybody here will be.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEELEY. I do.

Mr. MANN. Is not that person already under subpœna from the Senate committee?

Mr. NEELEY. I rather apprehend that is true.

Mr. MANN. According to newspaper reports.

Mr. NEELEY. What is to prevent him from getting away from here if he is in such dire danger as his statement indicates?

Mr. MANN. I do not see anything in the way of preventing him from getting away from any committee.

Mr. NEELEY. That is the reason I say we ought to hurry this matter and get this resolution through.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I agree cordially with all that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] said, because in my judgment there is no reason whatever for delay. This is not a business to be decided by the Committee on Rules. This is a business to be considered by the House of Representatives and decided now, because it is the honor and the integrity of the House which these charges impeach. It is not Col. Mulhall, a gentleman, by the way, whom I have never to my knowledge seen, nor directly or indirectly communicated with, who has brought these charges to the attention of the people of the United States. This has been done by the sponsors of these charges, two of the greatest newspapers in the world. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said, "not too scrupulous newspapers." I know of no papers whose integrity stands higher. These papers print a facsimile of a receipt for $100 for a month's services as a spy given by a man who was then an employee of the House and who is still in its employ. They print facsimiles of letters, telegrams, and other documents which seriously reflect upon the integrity of men who formerly served in this House and upon some who are now among its Members. These charges are plainly stated and very easily understood. And any three gentlemen on this floor can sit down and in 15 minutes draw all the resolution that is necessary to make all the investigation that is necessary.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] first moved that we refer this matter to the Committee on Rules, and that the committee report on Saturday. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] objected, and then the gentleman from New York suggested that the committee report "as soon as possible." Later, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] saw the attitude of the House, he modified the motion to refer by adding an amendment instructing the committee to report on Saturday. But he said in discussing that motion that he would call before his committee all of the people whose names are mentioned in the resolution. Now, if that is to be the procedure, it is, of course, very evident that the committee can not report on Saturday.

Mr. RUCKER. Nor on Wednesday, either.

Mr. COOPER. Nor on Wednesday, either.

Mr. HENRY. Just one moment, if the gentleman will permit me. I did not say the Committee on Rules would call these gentlemen. I said if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] desired to be heard, or any other Member wished to be heard, the Committee on Rules would do them the courtesy of hearing them on the shaping up of this resolution.

Mr. COOPER. That would be entirely unnecessary. We can pass a proper resolution now, and if the committee finds that its jurisdiction as given by the resolution is not sufficient to subpœna such witnesses and bring such papers and documents before it as are necessary, they can then ask for additional authority. But, in my judgment, it is the duty of the House to pass a resolution for a thorough investigation and to pass it now. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENRY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Among the names which have been mentioned in this portion of the article referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is the name of my colleague from Missouri, the Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT. He is away from the House on a leave of absence, having been compelled to go abroad to take his wife, who was seriously ill. In his name I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of the motion that has been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that the Committee on Rules should take this matter up with the least possible delay and report here some resolution that will cover the situation entirely and enable us to completely investigate all the charges that have been made in this newspaper article.

Dr. BARTHOLDT has represented the tenth congressional district of Missouri in this House for over 20 years. He is now serving his eleventh term, having had 11 consecutive elections to this House. He is respected and highly honored, and rightfully, by the people of his great district. They know that he is and has been during all this time a most able, efficient, and worthy representative. [Applause.] They know that he has never been swerved from what he considered their best interests and the best interests of the country by any influence other than that which was most honorable in every respect. [Applause.] Hence no action is necessary by this House, so far as the good name of Dr. BARTHOLDT is concerned among the people of St. Louis. Yet I am most anxious, as I know he is, that these lies and slanders may be made known in the best and most efficient way. If he were here I am sure he would most heartily indorse a thorough and complete investigation of the charges, because of his desire to see the integrity and honor of the House maintained at all times.

I think that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] should, along with all other resolutions referring to this matter that have been introduced, go to the Committee on Rules, in which committee we have the fullest confidence, that they may report out at the earliest possible date a resolution broad and comprehensive enough to enable the House to make a searching inquiry into this whole question. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or five minutes, if he desires.

Mr. MANN. I may want five.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, following the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], I ask the Clerk to read the following telegram.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, June 30, 1913.

HON. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I join emphatically in demand for searching investigation by special committee of House of Representatives of Mulhall allegation. Am sailing to-morrow, to take my sick wife to Europe, and can not appear personally, but will answer by cable each and every question to be formulated by committee. Address Schleiz, Germany.

RICHARD BARTHOLDT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. BARTHOLDT needs no defense, here or anywhere else, where he is known. It is unfortunate in one sense, perhaps, that he is compelled to go abroad at this time, but undoubtedly, if necessary, he will come back, and whether he comes back or not he is ready to answer all questions in reference to this or any other matter in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I think the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] should prevail. I appreciate the feeling that gentlemen have about immediate action. Some gentlemen have that feeling because they are easily worked upon in feeling. Some gentlemen have it because they think they can at once perfect a resolution. Some gentlemen have it because they think they have been criticized for delay. There may be various other reasons given, and they may be good reasons. But the wisest thing that a wise man does when he is excited is to try to keep cool and when he has a tendency to act hastily to draw back until he knows what he is doing.

I have a resolution which one gentleman has prepared for an investigation of these charges of Mr. Mulhall. I think that the investigation ought to go away beyond the charges made by Mr. Mulhall or the activities of the National Association of Manufacturers. When you are investigating the National Association of Manufacturers, why not investigate also the activities of the other side—the labor organizations? Why not investigate the activities of the temperance organizations and of the liquor organizations and of all other organizations which have attempted to influence Congress, either by reason of fear, threats, or help? That is a very wide field; but the committee that is appointed should have the power, wherever a lead appears, to follow the lead and not be confined by narrowing language.

I do not believe, with all respect to the ability of the Members of this House, that there is anyone here who is able to sit down and dictate a resolution of this kind which will stand investigation. Fortunately we have not been trained to the drawing of resolutions for the investigation of Members of Congress. I hope we shall never get that training. But when we do pass a resolution, let us pass it so that the committee appointed will have the requisite power.

I am sorry that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has stated that his committee would report by Saturday. I think it would be better for the House and the committee that prepares the resolution to take time enough to be cool enough to prepare a proper resolution. Why, we have managed to live since Sunday, and this is Wednesday. I am surprised that some of these gentlemen have not dropped dead from heart failure for fear somebody will believe that some Member of the House is crooked; I hope not themselves. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not care about charges which may be made here or elsewhere affecting my honor or my honesty. I know that the people who know me know that no one can buy me, no one can influence me by threats, and, I regret to say, many believe they can not influence me even by reason. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 31 minutes remaining.
Mr. HENRY. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, having had the pleasure of serving in this House with all, I believe, of the Members and ex-Members referred to in the article read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and having known personally some of the Senators and by observation and repute others of the Senators involved, there is no doubt in my mind that the charges now being considered by this House, so far as they affect many of the gentlemen named, are wholesale slanders; that the author is a liar and that those who circulated them, if circulated for the purpose of injuring the reputation and character of Senators and Members on either side of this Chamber, are scoundrels.

But that is not the question we are called upon to deal with at this time. Here are charges so grave in character, affecting both sides of this Chamber, that they cast a stigma upon the good name of distinguished men with whom we have served and with whom we are now serving. The country demands not that we delay action until some committee can prepare one of these scientifically drawn resolutions we have heard discussed, but that we immediately adopt a resolution authorizing a committee, capable and willing to investigate, to carry on an investigation now. Put in it, if you please, in the language of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—insert verbatim, if you please—that the committee is authorized "whenever a lead is presented, to follow the lead," and go wherever human judgment may dictate that it is necessary to go in order to unearth every accusation made, and if unfortunately the accusation prove to be true, to present the facts to the House and the country, that the guilty may receive the just condemnation of this House and of all good people. If, on the other hand, gentlemen have been unjustly stigmatized, have been wronged, have been traduced, have been slandered, let the country know it and let this House have opportunity to vindicate them as far as the House can vindicate them. The regret is that this House is so powerless that we must stand here like infants and allow slanderous tongues to circulate these foul charges throughout the country, if they are foul, and we content ourselves with a mere investigation. The best investigation on earth, and the one which I recommend to the gentleman from Kentucky, is to get a shotgun and investigate where the scoundrel is who would "filch from me my good name." [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the reasoning advanced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to why this matter should go to the Committee on Rules and be reported back on Saturday. It is in order that the resolution may be put in proper shape so that the committee, acting under that resolution, may be duly and legally constituted with all necessary authority to do what is the evident wish of this House; that is, make a thorough, comprehensive, and full investigation of the matters and things alleged against some Members of Congress and some former Members of Congress, and alleged against certain organizations which are not connected with the public official life of the country.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that this resolution be drawn with some degree of care, because it is proposed to invest this proposed committee with the power to subpœna witnesses and to swear those witnesses. In other words, this resolution is to have the force and effect of law. It is to be law. Unless it has that effect you will find that where a witness has been subpœnaed, and he is contumacious or recalcitrant, the committee will be powerless to punish or have him punished. If a witness is guilty of perjury or false swearing, unless the resolution duly authorizes the committee to act in a proper and legal way, no criminal charge can be supported against such false witness. Therefore I think there is no occasion for the House at this time to be unduly hasty. The country knows that the Senate is now investigating these charges, and has been engaged in that investigation for some days. The country knows that the Senate committee will pursue that investigation. The country knows that this House will speedily and thoroughly investigate all the matters and things involved in the Mulhall charges, so called. I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we ought not to restrict this investigation to matters alleged in the Mulhall charges, but that we ought to go further and consider this whole matter; that we ought to go out and consider what has been done by these other people and agencies that the gentleman from Illinois has suggested. Therefore I think this matter is of such gravity that this House owes it to its sense of orderly and proper discharge of the public business, and for the successful action of the House and its committee, to let the Committee on Rules bring this matter in here, carefully considered and well prepared, on Saturday next. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] mentioned, among the numerous organizations that he would like to see investigated by a proper committee of this House, the labor movement, and I presume he means the American Federation of Labor, in their activities in Washington. As an international officer of one of the greatest labor organizations in this country—the International Molders' Union—I want to say that we court the fullest investigation; and I speak authoritatively when I say that I have it from the officers of the American Federation of Labor that the labor movement look upon this as the opportunity they have been hoping for, for many years, to bring out the fact that there has been a lobby consistently working in Washington to crush the efforts of organized labor to bring about a better and greater measure of social and industrial justice in this country for all of the workers, organized and unorganized.

They court a full investigation, and I have in my hand a resolution that I intended to introduce, and which I shall introduce, if it goes to the committee, that will give the gentlemen the opportunity they want to follow up every lead and bring within its scope every organization that has been actually trying to bring about this system that is contained in the Mulhall charges. The American Federation of Labor and the entire labor movement of this country court the fullest investigation by this House and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]. I feel it is very much safer in this matter to spend a few hours, or even a few days, in getting the resolution in proper shape rather than to rush it now and find later on that there are some necessary elements omitted from it. There may be those present who can recall from a single reading all the elements in the resolution. I confess that I can not. I can recall very distinctly a few years ago, when the resolution for investigation of the Interior Department was before the House, we took hours, even days, in the discussion of it, and it was worked out with great elaborateness. I am quite sure, from listening to the reading of the resolution this afternoon, that there are many elements omitted from it which the House, after very careful consideration, inserted in the Ballinger resolution. Let me call attention to some of them, and the mere reading of them will suggest the necessity for them in this resolution also. The question of contempt, the question of producing papers, the question of compelling witnesses to testify were all under consideration. I heard a while ago upon this floor that a witness before the Senate investigation committee in a matter similar to this this very afternoon refused to answer a certain question to the Senate committee. What will that committee do? What power has it in the premises? The same thing may happen here, and it may also happen that if you rush this resolution through now in an imperfect state there may be critics later on who will say that you did it purposely so the committee would not have power to go to the bottom of this matter as it should do. The Ballinger resolution contained this provision:

> In case of disobedience to a subpœna the committee may invoke the aid of any court in the United States, or of any of the Territories thereof, or of the District of Columbia or of the District of Alaska, within the jurisdiction of which any inquiry may be carried on by such committee, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, documents, etc., under the provisions of this resolution.
> And any such court within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry under this resolution is being carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person under authority of this resolution, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said committee and produce books and papers, if so ordered, and give evidence touching the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding, except in prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. In addition to being subject to punishment for contempt, as hereinbefore provided, every person who having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who having appeared refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation herein authorized, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not more than one year nor less than one month.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will it interfere with the gentleman if I ask a question there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is for information. This is an important matter. That was a joint resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This was a House joint resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And had the effect and force of law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I was about to indorse the sentiments of the gentleman from Tennessee and say that if it could be done this ought to be made a House joint resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether it is practical or not. I take it it would depend upon the scope of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not mean a joint resolution. He means it was a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It was a House joint resolution for a joint committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My recollection is it was a joint resolution signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is a House joint resolution; yes. It is virtually the law of the land.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It made that law, of course. Has the gentleman any idea as to what we could do if we have just a simple House resolution upon that question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would not attempt to determine that, but I doubt the authority of the House to grant such powers to any committee as were granted this committee, and without such powers an investigation made will necessarily be a limited and defective one, and in order that the resolution may be made so complete, so full, and that such powers may be given it as to make the investigation so thorough that nobody can come in hereafter and say a loophole was left or any chance for evasion made, I think we should be sure it has the necessary power. Any investigation made ought to satisfy the public that it is thorough and complete.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course, we have already the power necessary to investigate charges which relate to the conduct of the membership of this House or the officers of the House, but when we go out and investigate some other charges relating to the conduct of some other people, does the gentleman think that the House, by a simple resolution, could give the committee authority to investigate that which we do not seek for the purpose of legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think so.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. My purpose is that I desire to reply to some of the remarks made a moment ago, and if the gentleman from Texas has all the time, I would like to know where the balance of the time on the other side is.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is in abeyance.

The SPEAKER. The rule about that is that the gentleman who gets the floor has an hour, if he wants to use an hour, and if during that hour he does not move the previous question, then the first gentleman who catches the Speaker's eye is recognized for another hour. The gentleman from Texas has the floor until the end of his hour, and he can move the previous question when he gets ready.

Mr. HENRY. I think I will be able to give the gentleman some time. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I was just trying to locate where the time was.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am for the immediate consideration of this resolution. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] had the creditable impulse here this morning. He had been unjustly attacked, and being unjustly attacked the first thing he should have done was the thing he did do, rise and ask an investigation so far as he personally was concerned. He did not intend when he did that to preclude a broad investigation of the whole proposition. Now, he has asked that his resolution be considered as a matter of privilege, and during its consideration it will be in order for amendments to be offered. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] will offer one amendment. I have not seen it. I hope it is broad enough to take in all the subject matter of the Mulhall exposures. If it does not do this, the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN] will offer an amendment which will. The only proposition that the House should act on is an immediate response by way of ordering an investigation of the charges which have been made.

The Senate has no difficulty in meeting these charges with dispatch. The Senate committee is already at work making progress in this matter. There is absolutely no reason why reference should be made to the Committee on Rules. This House itself is competent to pass upon a resolution which will go into all the matters involved in this exposé. I hope that when the House does adopt the resolution it will not stop at any halfway point. It is not infrequent in this country for charges to be made against Members of Congress. They are made loosely most of the time. It is not so very many years ago when Mr. Hearst revealed some letters which had to do with Members of Congress. It is not so many hours ago when the American sugar interests made charges against Members of Congress. Now here are certain other charges which have been made, and my hope is that in any investigation which is to be made by this House it will not consist merely of an investigation of charges against Members of Congress or the manipulation of committees of Congress, but that it will go further and show what there is in this charge that there is in this country a monstrous organization of interests in conspiracy to corrupt public men and to influence them by the hiring of spies and by the employment of disreputable and dishonorable methods to discredit labor and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the wisdom of the action of Mr. SHERLEY in demanding a searching and immediate investigation into the charges made against him. Neither his colleagues in this House nor his constituents, I am sure, doubt his integrity, and his courageous and speedy demand for an investigation is in every way commendable. Mr. SHERLEY has very wisely concurred in the provision that in so far as he was concerned it should be a most sweeping, full, and satisfactory investigation of the whole affair.

There is another phase of this situation which commands the attention of the country, in which it is more interested even than any attack upon the reputation of any single individual.

If it be true, Mr. Speaker, that there exists in this country an organization of men who personally pose as honest, patriotic business men, and who, as an organization, are engaged in the business of employing spies, of bribing labor organizations, of sitting in secret chambers of this House, and who have paid out millions of money for that purpose, who are so far-reaching that they include over 5,000,000 employees under their sinister control, if they are capitalized at $10,000,000,000, the power of that much money, employing that vast army of men, is simply appalling, and if they did for years and years keep in their employ at a high salary a man like Mulhall that is also appalling. The time has come when the American people are more interested in knowing all about invisible government, in knowing about every dollar that is expended for the purpose, directly or indirectly, of affecting legislation than in you or me or anybody else, and it is time now——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I would like one minute more.

Mr. HENRY. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. STANLEY. The time has come for this House, tranquilly, courageously, patriotically, without hurry, but with grim determination, to know the truth and the whole truth, to turn the limelight upon all that this man knows, every voucher that he has, upon all the activities of this association, that such organization in the future may be impossible, and that, if necessary, legislation may be passed that will prevent the organization and the operation of powerful concerns of this kind, whose purpose may be to debauch legislation and to disorganize labor. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, my opinion on this question has undergone some modification after hearing the argument, if the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is true. Now, they proceed to argue that it would be fatal if this was not drawn with all the pains of an indictment, with all the authority to examine witnesses and send for papers. They overlooked the fact that you could amend at any time. They overlooked the fact that at any time you could add to its powers. But since they insist that a man can not write a resolution of that kind, it occurs to me that this resolution ought to go to a committee, but the Committee on the Judiciary rather than the Committee on Rules, since it requires such legal talent to write it. But this reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of the advocate at the bar who, when confronted by a political question that he can not answer, invariably shouts to the multitude "Unconstitutional"; and that answers every argument.

As a matter of truth these gentlemen really know that this resolution is broad enough as written by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] to get the witnesses, and that is all that you are seeking to do. You are not trying to impeach anybody. It would be required, in addition to the investigation of the gentleman from Kentucky, to name all of the other men.

I make these observations to let these men know that they are not imposing on me as far as that kind of argument goes, for they know if what they say be true that this really ought to go to the Judiciary Committee. I am willing personally to have this go through now. I know the resolution is broad enough. Or I am willing to wait until Saturday or Wednesday, just so the work is done and done quickly enough in order that the American people may know that we are not trying to dodge any part of the investigation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman know or can he think of anything the House of Representatives has to do from now on until 7 o'clock this evening but to consider this matter and pass the proper resolution?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] has expired.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman states that we have power enough in this resolution to command witnesses to appear and make any sort of statement. I want to call attention to the fact that the resolution to investigate the Money Trust was very broad, and yet a New York banker came before the committee and was asked a question and hid behind the Constitution with the proposition that there was no authority to confer the power in the resolution to compel an answer to that question. He has been indicted by a grand jury here in the District of Columbia, and his case is now in court.

Mr. HAY. Did not the Committee on Rules draw that resolution?

Mr. HENRY. The Committee on Rules did draw that resolution, and I think it was very broad indeed and reached practically everything within constitutional limitations. Hence we are thus admonished to be cautious and deliberate to-day.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman know when that resolution came before the House a fatal weakness was pointed out and the gentleman resisted any amendment?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, no; that is not true.

Mr. COOPER. That is the record, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is anyone who can draw a better one, he will be heard by the Committee on Rules; and those gentlemen who are so afraid that this investigation will not be broad enough and thorough enough will be entirely mistaken. There is no desire to cover up or conceal anything. All we wish to do is to be deliberate and calculating here to-day, and not be thrown into a fit of hysterics. Let this resolution be sent to the committee and be considered in an orderly way—in the way in which all resolutions should be considered, and the way in which the Ballinger resolution was considered—and by Saturday you will have a report here, and if you desire you can amend it as you please then, and this House can do what it pleases with that resolution.

What we want is a genuine investigation and no haphazard, half-cocked proposition on this occasion. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question on his motion to refer.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to refer.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY and Mr. MURDOCK demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 36.

So the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I move that the House take a recess until 6 o'clock this afternoon, and that the Committee on Rules be directed to report at that hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this is not a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] calls attention to the fact that it is not a privileged motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to make an explanation, Mr. Speaker. There are two privileged resolutions here, and this is the last day when they could be considered, and they should be reported to-day.

Mr. RUCKER. I realize that my motion may not be acceptable to those who want to run the House. I am not trying to run it. I am not attempting to encroach upon the prerogatives of any gentleman who thinks he has the right or who wants to arrogate to himself the authority to run the House, and I do not mean this as a criticism of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]. I simply make this motion, because that is the quickest way to get the desired result.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The resolution that has just been passed provided for the reporting back next Saturday, did it not?

Mr. HENRY. The request or motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demanded the regular order.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, what became of my motion?

Mr. MANN. I demanded the regular order, and that shuts out the gentleman's motion. I take the responsibility for it.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not questioning that. The gentleman from Illinois is responsible for very much that is done here, especially if it is wrong. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. LINDBERGH. The House, of course, takes official notice of its own existence and of its committees and the members upon its committees. I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, but as a matter of fact——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LINDBERGH. The majority of that committee is holding——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that does not present a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Minnesota, to see if he has one.

Mr. HARDWICK. He has already stated enough to show that he has not.

The SPEAKER. He has not yet shown that he has.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I started to state, Mr. Speaker, that that committee as a matter of fact, or at least a majority of that committee, with its chairman, is meeting from day to day, or at least very frequently, and in those meetings there is being considered what is now known as the Glass bill, and——

The SPEAKER. There is not any question of personal privilege in that.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I have not fully stated it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If that is the line of it, there is no question of personal privilege in it.

Mr. LINDBERGH. That is the line of it.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no question of personal privilege in it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH], as I understand it, is attempting to state a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that, but he has not stated such a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. How can the Speaker determine unless the Speaker hears him?

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked him a moment ago if he rested his question on the same line, and he stated he did.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I am a member of that committee, and I am excluded from the meetings of that committee. That is the question of personal privilege that I wanted to submit.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of privilege.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. If a gentleman should present himself at the door of this House as a duly elected Member of this House, would the question of admitting him or not be a question of constitutional privilege?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is stating a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Speaker, it does not affect any question before the House. We are not here to consider moot questions. The inquiry that the gentleman makes does not affect any question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not finished making his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right.

Mr. MURDOCK. Along the same line, if a gentleman presents himself as a Member of this House at the door of a committee room during a meeting of the members of that committee of which he is a member, and he is refused entrance, does not that constitute a matter of the highest constitutional privilege?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no matter is before the House at the present time.

The SPEAKER. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. MANN. And I should like to be heard just a moment on the point of order. A matter of personal privilege can be brought before the House without a preliminary resolution, but a matter involving the privileges of the House, a matter of high privilege, must be brought before the House in the form of a resolution, not in the form of a statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understood the gentleman had presented a resolution.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I send to the desk a resolution on that question, which I ask to have read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the regular order was demanded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] awhile ago. I have a couple of privileged reports here from the Committee on the Judiciary that I desire to submit to the House.

The SPEAKER. There is a difference between privileged matters and questions of privilege.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Alabama quite understands that, but he thought he had an understanding with the Chair that he would be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if we ever get to a place where the Chair can do so. The Clerk will report the resolution of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Chair thinks it is impossible to recognize the gentleman from Alabama now, why, the gentleman will wait.

The SPEAKER. In the present situation it is impossible. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives as a coordinate branch of Congress was created by the Constitution, and its proceedings should properly be governed by the Constitution under which it has authority to and does adopt rules for the regulation of the deliberations of the House and its committees; and

Whereas under its authority the House has adopted rules for the regulation of its deliberations, including that of its committees, and has created various committees to which the House, either direct or by its Speaker, refers bills and resolutions for consideration; and

Whereas the Banking and Currency Committee is one of the duly constituted committees of the House, and, among other bills that have been referred to said committee by the Speaker is H. R. 6454, known as the Glass bill, as well as the administration bill, and is the bill that is likely to be principally considered on the question of banking and currency for the action of this House at the present session; and

Whereas the consideration of said bill before said committee by each and all of the members of the said committee is a question of the highest privilege under the Constitution, the laws, and the rules of the House, and by their oaths they are charged with the responsibility of considering the same in committee; and

Whereas the press generally publish it as an assured fact, and it is a common rumor around the Capitol and generally understood and known to be a fact that some members of the said Committee on Banking and Currency meet together with the chairman of said committee from day to day, or at least frequently, and deliberate on the provisions of said bill with a purpose to frame the same so as to report it without permitting other members on the committee to take part in such deliberations; and

Whereas the members so meeting and those acquiescing therein constitute two-thirds of the total membership on the committee and are known as the majority, make said meetings secret and exclusive and actually exclude the other one-third of the membership of the said committee; and

Whereas the acts of the two-thirds so meeting or acquiescing in such meetings have a powerful and probably controlling influence on the form in which the bill is likely to be reported to the House for its consideration if such meetings are permitted to continue; and

Whereas such meetings are in contravention of the Constitution, the laws, and the rules of the House, and while such facts are known, yet the House may not take official notice thereof: Now, therefore, in order to determine the true state of facts officially in regard to all the matters stated, and as a constitutional privilege of the highest order of all members to act in the committees in which they belong, and as a personal privilege of every member of the Banking and Currency Committee to be present at all meetings at which bills referred to said committee are considered, and to all the Members of the House that all members of the committee should be present to take part in the consideration of bills, and therefore the House should know all the facts in relation to the acts of the committee: Now, therefore, be it——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has not finished reading it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not necessary that he should finish it.

Mr. MANN. Only the preamble has been read. The resolution has not been read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not necessary that it should be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven be appointed by the Speaker to forthwith ascertain the true facts and report immediately to the House whether a part of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, with the chairman of the committee, are holding secret or other meetings for the purpose of framing the said bill or to influence the same and are excluding a part of the membership of said committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. If this resolution is entertained, will it be in order to ask whether the Progressive members of this committee are entitled to meet by themselves or by himself?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks one would be just as much a question of privilege as the other.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I presented that as a question of the highest privilege of the House instead of as a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair rules that there is no question of privilege of any character in it whatsoever.

LOANING TENTS TO CONFEDERATE VETERANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 98) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of Confederate veterans' reunion to be held at Brunswick, Ga., in July, 1913, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The Senate amendments, I believe, add certain things that are ordinarily necessary and some cots?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Has it been usual to grant the use of cots with these resolutions?

Mr. HAY. It has been in some cases.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it was done in one case that I know of—in the case of the Confederate veterans' reunion at Macon, Ga.

Mr. HAY. It has been done in some cases as to both Confederate and Union veterans.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

FREDERICK WILLIAM RAIFFEISEN.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Upon what subject—on this California matter?

Mr. CURRY. No. It is to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a speech delivered by Mr. David Lubin, of Sacramento, Cal., at the monument and house of Frederick William Raiffeisen, near Coblenz, Germany, on June 12, 1913. The occasion of the address was a visit to the birthplace of Raiffeisen by the American Agricultural Commission that sailed from New York on the 26th of last March.

Mr. Lubin is a man of world-wide fame. He is the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture that was organized by the King of Italy and has headquarters at Rome.

Raiffeisen was the creator of the rural credit system of Germany, and that system is now engaging the attention of and being studied by every agricultural country in the world.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

Address delivered by David Lubin before the American commission on the occasion of its visit to the monument and house of Raiffeisen, near Coblenz, Germany, June 12, 1913.

"Mr. Chairman, Mr. Burgomaster, ladies, and gentlemen, I have prepared a few remarks for this occasion and wish to say that if you have come to hear eloquence or witness the subtle tricks of an actor or a speaker, you are quite likely to be disappointed. That gift was not given me. If any gift was given me, it was the ability to hold on tight like a bulldog to a proposition that seemed to me logical and right and that moved me. And in the issue before us, in the inquiry we are making, you, too, seem to be moved by similar impulses.

"My friends, we seem to be traveling on a fine line—the line between the sublime and the ridiculous. It reminds me much of the traditional story in the Koran—the story of the departed soul, which must walk over a bridge as narrow as a hair, when the wicked fall into the gulf of oblivion and the good continue on to the end until they reach paradise.

"We are engaged in a great work, a work as great and noble as was ever undertaken in the history of man; greater and nobler than the great work of the old Greek chieftain, Alexander the Great; greater than the work of Pompey or of Julius Cæsar; greater than that of Augustus Cæsar; greater than that of Napoleon; for the work that we are engaged in leads to the very gates of divinity—that divinity which we hold so much in awe; that divinity that leads right up to the gates of heaven, the gates of righteousness.

"If we are single minded and if our efforts are well directed, we are then on the line of the sublime; but if we are self-seeking or lacking in courage and ability, then we are on the line of the ridiculous.

"The great line of demarcation between the animal and man is the demarcation of service. The animal serves himself, and in serving others only does so under compulsion. But man, the real man, is placed here on earth in order that he may serve his fellows, not under compulsion, but freely and of his own will and with eagerness.

"In the service before us we have nothing to apologize for, not even to the great founders of religion, not even to the great apostles, nor to the great prophets, not even to God Almighty himself; for if we are truly within the precincts of this service, then are we truly within the precincts of His holy temple, and are therefore priests and soldiers fighting for might and power, and with might and power; fighting such a fight the privilege of which was given to but the few among the sons of man, for not even the prophets of old had a greater mission.

"At the present time we are come to learn. We are come to learn so that presently we may be enabled to teach, to teach not merely the American people, but the people of the North American Continent and the people of the South American Continent, and presently the results of the efforts of the American commission shall permeate everywhere, from land to land, from the beginning until the end, and around about the whole world. We are beginning to discern with clearness that the task before us is not merely economic amelioration, but that it is higher than that. It reaches upward until it strikes the true keynote of political stability, insuring peace and equity, not merely for the people of the United States, but political peace and equity wherever the principles underlying these doctrines shall take root.

"At the present time we are here at the feet of this master, Father Raiffeisen, and at the feet of the German people, to learn, but be it ever remembered that it is not merely a trait of the American people to learn, but to teach; and if we are distinguished in anything from other nations of the world it is by this very trait—that the American people learn in order to teach. We hope, therefore, to be enabled to pay back to our teachers of the European countries benefits in terms of service for the benefit their service has been to us, and to pay this back with interest and with compound interest. We hope presently to add our amendment to the really great work begun by Father Raiffeisen; we hope to show that the very root and secret of our work is not merely to find amelioration for the farmer—for it would be just as charitable to find amelioration for the shoemaker and for the carpenter—the scope of our work goes beyond that. In its final analysis this work will be found to insure not merely amelioration for the American farmer, but stability for the American Republic.

"If this statement be based on fact, if it contain an underlying truth that can be harnessed to service which may insure the stability of the American Republic, then it establishes the sanctity of our mission. If there be no such truth, then is all this work an illusion. But is it an illusion? Do we not see here all around us, in the great European countries that we have visited, the operations and results of rural cooperation and its beneficent and far-reaching effects? This is no mere abstract statement; it is a fact that any ordinary mind can readily prove for itself, a fact which should be understood not merely by us here, but by statesmen, the people that govern the United States.

"We are living not far distant from a time when it was fashionable to think that our welfare, our world, centered around our own vicinity, our own little village, our own State, our own Nation. But is there not a greater and a higher law? Is it not the welfare of all the nations of the earth which is the best guaranty of the welfare of our own Nation and of our own individual welfare? Do not darkness and an unprogressive state in one nation act and react upon the others? What benefit, for instance, is it to the world that there is such a country as Morocco? To whom is it a benefit? It is not even a benefit to the poor barbarians and beggars that live there. Let that country be developed; let the sun of progress and civilization shine upon it; let development pursue its course, and in the place of its few thousand indigents it would become filled with millions of progressive, prosperous people, blessing by their imports and exports their fellow men of other lands, of other countries. It is the amount of development and the progress of any nation and of all nations that make for the greater sum of human happiness, and a diminution of that progress and development in any one country necessarily diminishes the happiness of the whole.

"I am fully aware that I am not expected to give a historic sketch of Raiffeisen or of his system, for we are here on the scene, among the people with whom he dwelt, the people for whom he labored, of whom he was an integral part. It is to those very people that we have come, asking them to teach us; and shall we presume to tell them of Raiffeisen and of his system of cooperative rural credit? Shall we presumptuously start our labors of inquiry by attempting to teach our teachers?

"In speaking of Raiffeisen and of his work at this time we feel impelled to say that whatever be the results, whether the American people profit by this inquiry or no, there can be no question as to this, that the people of Germany and of other European countries are gainers through Raiffeisen and through the Raiffeisen system. This is so evident that it is impossible to refute it honestly. Nor is this all, for it is not alone Germany but many other European countries which are indebted, which are under lasting obligations to this beneficent pioneering force, this force which has so powerfully affected the economic life of the nations.

"Nor is it merely the economic life; it is also the political life of the nations which has been affected. The coalescing forces in social life were never more in evidence than in this early part of the twentieth century. At no time in the history of social life was this phenomenon more in evidence than it is to-day. Coalesced dollars and coalesced brains seem to have as intense an affinity for each other as oxygen has for hydrogen, and in those instances where there is an absence of dollars there is the same coalescing tendency of numbers, as witness the labor unions.

"And so the time has come when almost all the world of social life has crystallized itself into a series of coalescing forces, all in militant array, struggling and fighting for advantage. We must marvel at the keen foresight which brought into line within the coalescing field the formerly uncoalesced rural forces of Germany; and right here is the great merit of Raiffeisen and of his rural credit system. Raiffeisen evidently foresaw that the action and reaction of the coalesced urban forces upon the uncoalesced rural forces would end in the elimination of the independent landowning farmer of Germany. He must have further realized that the great political value of the independent landowning farmer really consists in this, that he is a conservative. We may observe that the farmer is the last man to change the style of his garments, the manner of his speech, the trend of his thoughts, his habits, and his religion. All this renders him a conservative, and as such he acts and reacts upon the progressive and radical urban, much the same as a governor regulates the pressure of the steam in a boiler; the conservative farmer holds in check the urban radical.

"Raiffeisen must have realized that the weakening of the independent landowning farmer would mean the weakening of the political life of the nation, and so he sought a way for bringing about the working of a coalescing force in the field of rural economy, a way which should enable the German farmer to keep at bay and overcome the destructive influence of the coalesced urban.

"In so far as this has been accomplished to a greater extent in Germany than in other countries, in so far is it safe to say that the political life of Germany is more sound to the core, contains within itself a greater resisting power, than the political life of other countries. It is therefore safe to say that the people of Germany and of other European countries are gainers through Raiffeisen and through the Raiffeisen system.

"It now remains to be seen whether it would be practicable to adopt this system in the United States. As a mode of procedure it was deemed expedient to make an exhaustive inquiry along these lines through the medium, as you know, of the American commission, all of which explains the reason of our pilgrimage through the European countries and, in a measure, of our presence here to-day.

"When the publications of the International Institute of Agriculture, setting forth the Raiffeisen and other European cooperative rural credit systems, reached the United States, they created a profound impression, resulting in the mission set on foot by the people and by the Government of the United States to send abroad the American commission, so that the duly accredited representatives of the various States of the Union and the representatives of the Nation might acquaint themselves with the facts, the operation, the environment, of those cooperative rural credit systems and with the results of their operations. The commission is to embody its inquiry in the form of a report, to which report it is to append its findings for the purpose of presenting the same to the Congress of the United States.

"The presence here of the American commission, our presence at this monument, our presence at this house where Raiffeisen lived, may therefore be regarded as one of the results of the beneficent labors of Raiffeisen, as an evidence of the high esteem in which he is held not merely by the people of Germany, not merely by the people of other European countries, but also by the American people.

"In this period of our inquiry it is too early for this commission to pronounce in favor of the adoption by the American people of the Raiffeisen system. Further inquiry may determine a conclusion in the affirmative; but whatever be the ultimate conclusion, there is no denying the hope, the strong hope, that we may toward the end of our inquiry be justified in setting forth in our finding if not the Raiffeisen system, as in operation in Germany, then some derivation of that system.

"Our visit to-day to this house, formerly occupied by Raiffeisen, is to be considered in the light of the highest tribute that it is possible for our commission to pay to his memory. It is intended to illustrate the fact that the truly beneficent are not merely citizens of the country of their birth or of the country in which they lived, but that they are citizens the whole world over and for all time.

"The time will soon be here when every self-respecting country will deem it its duty to set up the bust of Raiffeisen in its public parks and before its public buildings. Shall the world not honor the seer, the prophet, and the pioneer in the field of economic betterment, so long as it honors poet, musician, and soldier? The poet writes his poem, and forthwith is honored; the musician produces his music, and the world sings his praises; the soldier wins his battle, and 10,000 'hochs' fill the air. But for the seer, the prophet, and the pioneer in the field of economic betterment there is what? What but stubborn and persistent opposition? What but wrath, contempt, humiliation, ostracism, and oblivion? And yet it is these very seers, these very prophets, these very pioneers in the field of economic betterment that laboriously pave the way so that the world may have paths and byways, paths proudly strutted over by the much-honored poet, musician, and soldier, with no thought in their heads of the patient builders of these paths. These seers, these pioneers, must wait for recognition; they must wait to receive it after they are dead.

"Fortunately for the world these pioneers, knowing all this, realizing all this, nevertheless persist in their work, unwearyingly forging ahead, with their mind's eye ever fixed on one goal, accomplishment; and like patient donkeys they labor on, pulling the load steadily, even though their food be thorns and thistles, seasoned plentifully with kicks and curses. All honor, therefore, to these heroes, to that indomitable pioneer, to that pathfinder, Frederick William Raiffeisen.

"We go to the museums and bring our children there to see the armor that was worn by the knights of old. We relate to them their heroic achievements, their knightly deeds. But have we no knights in modern times? Are not the modern knights as chivalrous, as brave, and as generous as those of old? Who, then, are these knights? They are men like Raiffeisen, Büring, Schulze-Delitsche, Luzzatti, Wollemborg, and others of their kind. These modern knights are as chivalrous, as brave, and as generous as the knights of old, and more so, for the influence of these modern knights is infinitely more beneficent; the penetrating rays of their activity permeate in every direction, blessing all peoples for all time.

"May this visit to the house of the departed pioneer, the venerable Father Raiffeisen, be to us, the American commission, a good omen. May the life he led be a lesson to each one of us, so that we, as pupils, may catch the inspiration to profit by the high example his life has furnished. And if there be a conscious communication of the spirit of the departed with the living, and if that consciousness be expressed in the mode of our cognizance, it would surely follow that our visit here will be most pleasing to him whose spirit we have come to honor.

"DAVID LUBIN.

"COBLENZ, GERMANY, June 12, 1913."

WESTERN FUEL CO.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary on House resolution 180, which I send to the desk and ask to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 180.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and other memoranda and papers on file in the office of the Attorney General, or referred by the President to the Attorney General, relating to the postponement or delay of trial of cases against the Western Fuel Co. directors, J. C. Wilson, or either or any of them, now pending in the northern district of California.

[H. Rept. No. 31, 63d Cong., 1st sess.]

WESTERN FUEL CO. DIRECTORS.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany House resolution 180:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution (H. Res. 180) calling upon the Attorney General for copies of all correspondence and other memoranda and papers on file in the office of the Attorney General or referred by the President to the Attorney General relating to the postponement or delay of trial of cases against the Western Fuel Co. directors, J. C. Wilson, or either or any of them, now pending in the northern district of California, submit the following report:

The resolution as drawn by the author is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and other memoranda and papers on file in the office of the Attorney General or referred by the President to the Attorney General relating to the postponement or delay of trial of cases against the Western Fuel Co. directors, J. C. Wilson, or either or any of them, now pending in the northern district of California."

The attention of the Attorney General was called to this resolution by the chairman of the committee, as had been done in other like cases, and he was invited to make such suggestions as he thought proper. Afterwards, while the committee had under consideration the resolution, the Attorney General transmitted to the committee the file of the Department of Justice in this case, stating that the papers so transmitted were the complete file of his office and contained all correspondence and other memoranda and papers relating to the case.

After an examination of the said file so transmitted by the Attorney General the committee was in doubt as to the propriety of publishing some of these papers or some parts of some of these papers in such file, because of an apprehension on the part of the committee that the publication thereof might be incompatible with the public interest. Thereupon a subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. CLAYTON, WEBB, CARLIN, MCCOY, VOLSTEAD, MORGAN of Oklahoma, and CHANDLER of New York, was appointed to confer with the Attorney General as to the necessity of withholding from publication any of such papers, or any part of any of the same, for the reason above stated.

The subcommittee met with the Attorney General at the Department of Justice on Saturday evening last. There were present, besides the Attorney General and the members of the subcommittee, Assistant Attorney General Harr and Assistant Attorney General Graham. The Attorney General was requested, as the chief law officer of the Government, to give the committee the benefit of his opinion as to whether or not the file of the Department of Justice in this case might be published without detriment to the Government in the prosecution of the case. The Attorney General said, in effect, that personally he had no objection to the publication of everything in the file, but expressed the belief that certain portions of some of the papers should not be published, because it might be detrimental in the prosecution of the case.

Your committee is of opinion and so reports that a telegram dated June 18, 1913, from District Attorney McNab to the Attorney General and copy of a telegram from the Attorney General to the United States attorney, San Francisco, Cal., dated June 17, 1913, should not be made public at this time, because such publication would be incompatible with the public interest.

Your committee is also of the opinion and so reports that a portion of the report of District Attorney McNab to the Attorney General, dated May 20, 1913, should not be made public at this time, as its publication might be prejudicial to a fair and impartial trial of this case and incompatible with the public interest. The portion of said report so withheld is a statement of the facts in the case which the Government expects to be able to prove.

In view of the fact that your committee examined all the original papers and documents covered by the resolution and made copies of the same, which are hereby made a part of this report, except as above stated, your committee is of opinion that the purpose of the resolution has been accomplished, and therefore so report and recommend that the resolution do lie on the table.

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. MANN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the Clerk now reading?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is a report of the Committee on the Judiciary, a privileged report.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk should read the resolution, but the report of the committee can not be read except in the time of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was my request, and that is the order.

Mr. MANN. I did not know that.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the unanimous action of the committee, all shades of political opinion being represented, and in obedience to the instruction of the committee, all information and papers sought by the resolution having been obtained, I move that the resolution do lie on the table. The purpose of the resolution has been accomplished and the papers furnished.

The motion was agreed to.

MAURY DIGGS AND DREW CAMINETTI.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary on House resolution 181, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 181.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and other papers and memoranda on file in the office of the Attorney General, or referred by the President to the Attorney General, relating to the prosecution or trial of Maury Diggs and Drew Caminetti, or either of them, for violation of the Mann White-Slave Act.

[H. Rept. No. 32, 63d Cong., 1st sess.]

UNITED STATES AGAINST FARLEY DREW CAMINETTI AND MAURY DIGGS.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany House resolution 181:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution (H. Res. 181) calling upon the Attorney General for copies of all correspondence and other papers and memoranda on file in the office of the Attorney General or referred by the President to the Attorney General relating to the prosecution or trial of Maury Diggs and Drew Caminetti, or either of them, for violation of the Mann White-Slave Act, submit the following report:

The resolution as drawn by the author is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and other papers and memoranda on file in the office of the Attorney General or referred by the President to the Attorney General relating to the prosecution or trial of Maury Diggs and Drew Caminetti, or either of them, for violation of the Mann White-Slave Act."

The attention of the Attorney General was called to this resolution by the chairman of the committee, as has been done in other like cases, and he was invited to make such suggestions as he thought proper. Afterwards, while the committee had under consideration the resolution, the Attorney General transmitted to the committee the file of the Department of Justice in this case, stating that the papers so transmitted were the complete file of his office and contained all correspondence and other papers and memoranda relating to the case.

After an examination of said file so transmitted by the Attorney General, the committee was in doubt as to the propriety of publishing some of these papers or some parts of some of these papers in such file because of an apprehension on the part of the committee that the publication thereof might be incompatible with the public interest. Thereupon a subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. CLAYTON, WEBB, CARLIN, MCCOY, VOLSTEAD, MORGAN of Oklahoma, and CHANDLER of New York, was appointed to confer with the Attorney General as to the necessity of withholding from publication any of such papers or any part of any of the same for the reason above stated.

The subcommittee met with the Attorney General at the Department of Justice on Saturday evening last. There were present besides the Attorney General and the members of the subcommittee Assistant Attorney General Harr and Assistant Attorney General Graham. The Attorney General was requested, as the chief law officer of the Government, to give the committee the benefit of his opinion as to whether or not the file of the Department of Justice in this case might be published without detriment to the Government in the prosecution of the case. The Attorney General said, in effect, that personally he had no objection to the publication of everything in the file, but expressed the belief that certain portions of some of the papers should not be published, because it might be detrimental in the prosecution of the case.

Your committee is of opinion and so report that the statement of facts of this case in the report of District Attorney McNab to the Attorney General under date of May 21, 1913, should not be published because such publication would be incompatible with the public interest.

Your committee is also of opinion and so report that the reports of the special agent of the Department of Justice should not be published at this time, because incompatible with the public interest, except the copy of the letter signed "Clayton Herrington" on the first page thereof, which copy is hereto attached.

In view of the fact that your committee examined all the original papers and documents covered by the resolution and made copies of the same, which are hereby made a part of this report, except as above stated, your committee is of opinion that the purpose of the resolution has been accomplished and therefore so report and recommend that the resolution do lie on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the unanimous action and instruction of the Committee on the Judiciary, where all the three parties were represented by the lawyers composing that committee appointed and authorized by this House, having carefully considered this matter, I move that the resolution, for the reasons stated in the report, do now lie on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman having consumed some considerable time, is he not willing to let this side of the House have some time?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition to lie on the table, as I understand it, is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, having reported a privileged resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table, and before the motion to lay on the table was put having taken the floor and having read in his time the report of the committee, then, again, on the floor having made a speech, is it not in order for the gentleman now to yield time before the motion to lay on the table is put to the House or made by the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The situation would be this: The gentleman had the report read, and ordinarily if anybody objected it could not have been read.

Mr. MANN. That was done in his own time. The gentleman asked to have it read in his time, and so stated.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the question to lay on the table is not debatable, but it seems to the Chair under the circumstances of the case that the motion to lay on the table ought to be considered in suspense.

Mr. MANN. It has always been held, Mr. Speaker, when a resolution of this sort is reported back to the House, while the motion to lay on the table was not debatable, the gentleman himself in charge of making the report is not required to make the motion to lay on the table until he is ready to do so; but meanwhile, the report being a privileged resolution, he has a right to the floor and to yield time within his hour. I desire to ask if he will yield time to this side of the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, do I understand, Mr. Speaker, the Chair to hold that upon the pending proposition the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has one hour for debate subject to his disposal?

The SPEAKER. He can have it if he withholds his motion. Then he can offer his motion at any time he pleases.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Illinois—I could not understand his statement fully, perhaps on account of a little confusion here—said something about an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to take the floor for an hour. He can yield time for debate if he chooses, but at any time within his hour he is entitled to move to lay on the table, and that ends debate.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is exactly what I was trying to ascertain, if the gentleman from Alabama has an hour of debate subject to his disposal on this pending proposition.

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the gentleman has used 8 minutes of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well, Mr. Speaker. Now, what is the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I would like to have half an hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. And then some other gentlemen will want other time?

Mr. CURRY. I would like 5 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is another 5 minutes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to have a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama does not have to yield to everybody; the Republican floor leader asked for 30 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Alabama fully understands that; but the gentleman from Alabama was trying to accommodate everybody, and he sees that within an hour's limit perhaps he can not accommodate everybody, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained, as much as I regret it, to have to insist upon the pending motion to lay on the table and to insist that it is not debatable.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman declines to yield any time to anyone else on this proposition?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would if I could serve or accommodate all the gentlemen on that side of the House within the hour; but I have, however, to——

Mr. MANN. There will be no further business in the House without a quorum until we have a chance to have some debate on this white-slave proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well; I perfectly understand what the gentleman means. I have no desire to violate, and could not if I would, the understanding had the other day, and that is that everything should be by unanimous consent. Of course, if I were disposed, which I am not, to violate the agreement—a thing I would not do—I would not try to raise the question of no quorum as the gentleman from Illinois suggested that he might do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly content, if the gentleman so desires, that this matter go over until the expiration of this agreement, which reaches to the 14th of July, and, Mr. Speaker, that this motion to lie on the table be then pending.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will have that one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is the motion to lie on the table debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the motion been made?

The SPEAKER. It has been made; but the Chair was trying to give these gentlemen a chance to come to an agreement so they might talk about the resolution if they wanted to do so.

Mr. MANN. I only asked for one minute, in order that I might ask my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] whether he has made up his mind he will not yield on this proposition to this side of the House or to anybody.

Mr. CLAYTON. I fully appreciate the courtesy and kindness expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and while I may not be as kind as he is, I hope to be as courteous and I hope to be as frank. The very proposition, if I may so phrase it, as to the debatableness of the motion that this lie on the table was made in the committee and was there talked about——

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has ruled that the gentleman may yield time. Now, I ask the gentleman if he is willing to yield time, or will he decline?

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me to complete a statement, and then he will appreciate the position of the "gentleman from Alabama," who is trying to reflect the wishes of the Committee on the Judiciary? And I was about to say that that committee considered this matter of the debatableness—that may be a coinage—of the motion to lie on the table, and the committee knew then that it could not be debatable, and no objection was made by anybody on that account; but it was said that there would certainly be opportunity for any gentleman who wanted to talk on this subject, and if he could not get the time when the question to lie on the table was up, he could certainly get it at some other time in the House, and there would be no disposition on the part of anybody to deprive anybody from indulging in the fullest criticism of the Department of Justice that he might see fit to make.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman be willing to answer my question yes or no?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am trying, and I will endeavor——

Mr. MANN. Yes or no. Will I get the time or will I not? That is easy.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman mean to utter criticisms upon the department?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield me time or will he decline to do so in debate on this proposition?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will be perfectly willing to give the gentleman 15 minutes of the 1 hour.

Mr. MANN. I want half an hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. If we can agree——

Mr. MANN. I want half an hour. I do not expect to use it all myself, but I want that much time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will be perfectly willing to give the gentleman 15 minutes and to give the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 10 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] 5 minutes. That would be half an hour.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman who is the author of the resolution wants some time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought perhaps you were going to give him your 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I wanted a little time myself, but I wanted more time for him.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think I ought to reserve for the committee 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may have 30 minutes more time in which to debate the question, and that I may have 30 minutes of time, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman, if he gets his 30 minutes, if he assumes he has the right to divide it out?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] have 30 minutes, that he himself have 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] have 10 minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. I shall object to that, Mr. Speaker, myself. I think if the gentleman from Illinois has half the time he has all to which he is entitled. I should be perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, if the chairman should give——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has already used 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think I can help this thing along by yielding five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. My request is only to divide the time equally between the majority and the minority.

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] presents a privileged resolution on which he has the right to have an hour. He has used 10 minutes. Then he moved to table the resolution. Of course, that is not debatable. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] now asks 30 minutes for himself and 30 minutes for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and 10 minutes for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and the gentleman from Alabama has already used 10 minutes. That makes it even. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there? I understand there was originally an hour, and how much of it has been exhausted?

The SPEAKER. This request of the gentleman from Illinois will make the debate run an hour and 10 minutes, and of that time the gentleman from Alabama is to have 30 minutes, already having used 10, which evened it up. He has 30 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 10 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is an hour and ten minutes of new time?

The SPEAKER. Of new time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ascertain exactly what it is. My mind sometimes does not move with the celerity of the Speaker's, but I am sure with equal accuracy, and hence I want to make my inquiry. That means that there will be 40 minutes awarded to the minority—those opposing this motion—and that there shall be only 30 minutes awarded to the committee and those advocating the motion. Now, I do not think that complies with the old-established rule which says that "equality is equity." I suggest that the time be split into two halves, and that I be given half the time and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] take half. I will accept that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Although the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] has already occupied 10 or 15 minutes, I shall ask that the gentleman's time be 40 minutes and that my time be 30 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. What was the gentleman's proposition, Mr. Speaker? My attention was diverted for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks leave to modify the request. The gentleman from Alabama is to have 40 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois is to have 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 10 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand that this "gentlemen's agreement" that we are acting upon will be preserved and respected, and it will be further carried out by not raising any question of quorum?

Mr. MANN. I have no promises of anything except what is contained in the request.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, if we have got to have that question of no quorum, I might as well confess that it is impossible for me to agree to spend an hour or more in debate here, with the understanding that at the end of that time the question of no quorum will be raised. We all know now that there will be no quorum here, for there is none here now. I insist upon my motion, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolution 181 do now lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama object to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not hear it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. It is to give 40 minutes to a side. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I was undertaking to answer.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Alabama is afraid to have this resolution considered without a quorum, I will make the point of no quorum, so that when it is considered it will be considered by a quorum. It is very important to have a quorum present when important legislation is considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is none.

Mr. CLAYTON. This is not important legislation. It is a proposition to adopt a report upon a resolution of inquiry which has brought the information desired.

There was something said, Mr. Speaker, about printing the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be printed as a matter of course, because it was read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course the gentleman knows that the gentleman from Alabama is not afraid of a political play, although such play at this time is to be regretted. The gentleman from Alabama wishes the House to now act on public business. Mr. Speaker, of course, under the suggestion raised by the gentleman from Illinois, we need not take up any more time. There is no quorum present, and one can not be obtained this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. There is only one of two things to do: One is to move to adjourn and the other is to move a call of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. With that motion of mine pending, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously agreed to, until Saturday, July 5, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of preliminary examination and survey of Clearwater Harbor, Fla., from the mouth of the Anclote River to the channel from the south end of Clearwater Harbor into and through Boca Ceiga Bay, thence into Tampa Bay (H. Doc. No. 123); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of Black River, S. C., up to Kingstree (H. Doc. No. 124); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

C., from the mouth of Panther Creek to the head of Chandlers Shoals, with a view to its improvement by means of open-channel work (H. Doc. No. 125); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

4. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on examination and survey of Red River, La. and Ark., from its mouth to Fulton (H. Doc. No. 126); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of Breton May, Md. (H. Doc. No. 127); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Platt National Park, Okla. (H. Doc. No. 129); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution submitting an estimate of appropriation for bookstacks for Government bureau libraries, Smithsonian Institution (H. Doc. No. 130); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LINDBERGH: A bill (H. SENATE:

THURSDAY, July 3, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that the lengthening shadows which fall along the path of 50 years of our national history lie upon no malice arising from the past; that peace and harmony and prosperity are the present heritage, with a bright, hopeful future stretching out before us.

We remember to-day the veterans gathered upon the field of their former glory. We thank Thee for their kindly relationship. We pray that the thin line of the heroes of the past may have the especial guidance and comfort and blessing of God Almighty, and that as they look back upon scenes so far gone they may also look forward to the hills of God in the evening of their lives, and have the light and peace that are promised in Thy word.

Now, we pray that Thou wilt bless our Nation more and more, giving to Thy servants in this Senate, who have come into the inheritance of the past, all grace and wisdom which shall justify their places of power and authority in this day, and guide them to yet greater victories for freedom, for humanity, and for God. We ask it in Christ's name. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the preceding day's session.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BACON. Unless there be something of importance in the Journal that some Senator desires to have read, I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The reading is dispensed with, and the Journal stands approved.

Mr. BACON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Unless there is some matter which a Senator desires to bring to the attention of the Senate, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 2 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 7, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 5, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supreme in all Thine attributes, our God and our Father, by the consciousness of Thy presence, by the insistence of Thy will, by the knowledge of Thy justice, by the grace of Thy mercy, by the hopes of Thy promises, by the reason with which Thou hast endowed us, help us to think right, to choose right, to do right, and, so far as lieth in us, to live peaceably with all men, doing unto them as we would have them do unto us. In the Christ spirit. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 2, 1913, was read and approved.

ENROLLED HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 98. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Confederate Veterans' Reunion, to be held at Brunswick, Ga., in July, 1913.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the finding of the Court of Claims in the case of Emmetta Humphreys, administrator de bonis non of John Sevier, sr., and John Sevier, jr., against the United States (H. Doc. No. 131) transmitted to the House on January 23, 1913, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands on January 24, 1913, be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It calls for a payment of money, and the Committee on the Public Lands has no jurisdiction over it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear the gentleman's request. What was it?

Mr. FERRIS. That the finding of the Court of Claims in the Gen. John Sevier case go to the Committee on Appropriations instead of the Committee on the Public Lands. The Committee on the Public Lands has no authority to recommend the appropriation of money. I think it ought to go either to Appropriations or Claims.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the Committee on Appropriations would have no jurisdiction of it if it is an ordinary finding.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not in a position to debate that question.

Mr. MANN. Unless it is a judgment, it goes to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not particular to which committee it goes. The parties interested would like to have it go to the Committee on Appropriations. I am willing that it should go to the Committee on Claims, if that is the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks that the communication be referred to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a careful examination of the bill (H. R. 6141) to amend the Erdman Act develops a fact which the Chair overlooked when he read it, although it was in the draft of the bill handed to him. The parliamentary clerk overlooked it also. Right at the end of that bill there is an appropriation of $25,000. Therefore the bill ought to be taken from the House Calendar and put on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MANN. The bill also creates two new offices.

The SPEAKER. Yes. So that change of reference will be made from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. TOWNSEND, for two weeks, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. DAVENPORT, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, for two months, on account of illness.

To Mr. TAGGART, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HARDWICK, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BORCHERS, for two weeks, on account of illness.

LOBBY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 198 (H. Rept. 33).

Whereas there have appeared in recent issues of various newspapers published in the United States divers statements and charges as to the existence and activity of a lobby organized by and on behalf of an organization known as the National Association of Manufacturers for the purpose of improperly influencing legislation by Congress, the official conduct of certain of its Members and employees, the appointment and selection of committees of the House, and for other purposes designed to affect the integrity of the proceedings of the House of Representatives and its Members: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of seven Members of the House and that such committee be instructed to inquire into and report upon all the matters so alleged concerning said Representatives, and more especially whether during this or any previous Congress the lobbyists of the said National Association of Manufacturers, or the said association through any officer, agent, or member thereof, did in fact reach or influence, whether for business, political, or sympathetic reasons or otherwise, the said Representatives or any one of them or any officer or employee of this or any former House of Representatives in or about the discharge of their official duties; and if so, when, by whom, and in what manner.

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers or any agent thereof to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election of any candidate for the House of Representatives of Congress, and said committee shall likewise inquire whether Members of Congress have been employed by said association for the accomplishment of any improper purpose whatever.

Said committee is also directed to inquire whether improper influence has been exerted by said association or by any other association, corporation, or person to secure the appointment or selection of the committees of the House, or any of them.

Said committee shall also inquire whether the said National Association of Manufacturers or any other organization or corporation or association or person does now maintain or has heretofore maintained a lobby for the purpose of influencing legislation by Congress and ascertain and report to what extent and in what manner, if at all, legislation has been improperly effected or prevented by reason of the existence of such lobby, if it be found to exist at all now or heretofore.

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit in the city of Washington or elsewhere to conduct its investigations during the sessions of the House or recess of Congress. It shall have power to employ such legal or clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary, to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, to be immediately available.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to what?

Mr. LEVY. To the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged resolution—highly privileged.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. HENRY. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. LEVY. If the gentleman will give me time to explain myself——

Mr. HENRY. I will give the gentleman time to explain; but I ask the gentleman to wait until we make an agreement. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas how much time he thinks we will need for general debate?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the point of order of no quorum withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The record will show that the point of order of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have had only a few requests for time for general debate on the resolution. In view of the fact that the resolution will probably be open to amendment and that Members desiring to discuss their amendment will have all the opportunity they desire, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. HENRY. I will state that it is my intention to allow the freest latitude of discussion and to the offering of amendments to the resolution. I have no desire to move the previous question within the next two or three hours, if it takes that long. I do not want to cut off amendment or discussion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly; I will be glad to have the gentleman make it.

Mr. MANN. Under the form in which this matter comes before the House any gentleman who secures the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment secures it for an hour's debate.

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Which he can use himself or dole out as he pleases?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So there can not be any very extended liberty about offering amendments unless there be some preliminary arrangement made in reference to time?

Mr. HENRY. I am perfectly willing to make an agreement in that regard, that any Member may offer an amendment during the progress of the debate.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent in some way as to the time for debate, with the further provision that any gentleman securing the floor shall have the right, while he has the floor, to offer an amendment, amendments to be pending, to be voted on at the end of the debate.

Mr. HENRY. I make that request.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that somebody desiring to offer an amendment might not be able to secure the floor.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the courtesy of both sides of the House would permit anybody who desired to offer an amendment, if time is not to be restricted, to have the floor.

Mr. HAY. Why not have an arrangement that any Member desiring to offer an amendment shall have the privilege of doing so?

Mr. MANN. I think that is proper.

Mr. GARNER. And furthermore, if we do not have some limit of time on the gentleman who offers the amendment, he could have an hour. I think it better be limited to 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to work out.

Mr. HENRY. Why not put it in this way: That the general debate do not exceed one hour, and that then we take the resolution up for consideration under the five-minute rule, for the purpose of amendment and explaining the amendments. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that general debate on this resolution be confined to one hour, and that then it shall be taken up for consideration under the five-minute rule, for amendment.

Mr. HENRY. Not exceeding one hour.

The SPEAKER. That there be general debate not exceeding one hour, and that then the resolution be taken up for consideration under the five-minute rule for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire whether the time has all been given up to Members for the hour?

Mr. HENRY. It has not.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know if I can have five minutes of that time?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman can have five or more.

Mr. LEVY. And with the understanding that I have that time?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; and the gentleman from New York, also. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I am to control 30 minutes of the time, and the gentleman from Kansas shall control 20 minutes of the time, and the other gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] 10 minutes.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if the gentleman can give me five minutes?

Mr. HENRY. I think I shall be able to do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that the gentleman from Texas shall control 30 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] 30 minutes, with some agreement that the other gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] shall have 10 minutes of the 30 minutes controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. POU. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENRY. A member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My intention is to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], a member of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that on last Wednesday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] introduced a resolution reciting certain publications which were made in the New York World and Chicago Tribune, and asked for an investigation in regard to himself of charges based on those publications. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY] also introduced a resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] introduced a resolution on the same subject, and so did the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN]. So there were four of these resolutions providing for the investigation of the lobby. The Committee on Rules has carefully examined all of those resolutions and has come to the conclusion that they would report a substitute to the House, which has been read by the Clerk and is now before the Members. This substitute speaks for itself, and provides for the broadest and most sweeping investigation of the charges which have been made in regard to a lobby. The Committee on Rules were of the opinion that this resolution should be as broad as the English language could make it in order that this committee of seven provided for in the resolution could go into this transaction and any other transaction with which a lobby might be connected.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I notice in the second paragraph of the resolution that an inquiry is provided as to whether this association exerted influence for the purpose of defeating the nomination or election of candidates for the House of Representatives?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Does that provide for any inquiry as to whether or not they were active in electing Members of Congress? Why was that left out?

Mr. HENRY. I think that language includes that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit? In line 12, "to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election of any candidate for the House of Representatives of Congress."

Mr. HENRY. "For nomination or election." I think if the gentleman will carefully read the whole resolution he will see that it covers the point, "to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election." However, if the resolution is not broad enough the committee have no objection to having it amended, and now places it in the hands of the membership of the House. I believe it is broad enough to reach all of these things, but we have brought it before the House after consideration and believe that it should be adopted. We have no pride of opinion as to its verbiage or authorship. We invite amendments and we do not desire to limit debate, but have requested that plenty of time be allowed for discussion and for amendment. Therefore this resolution is submitted to the House for its consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I do.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the committee considered the advisability of making the resolution a joint resolution so that there might not be perhaps a trying of a man at both ends of the Capitol at the same time?

Mr. HENRY. The committee gave that matter considerable attention and came to the conclusion that while it is desirable it is not practical at this time to do so.

Mr. FERRIS. Why?

Mr. HENRY. We tried to get into touch with members of the Senate committee. Well, there are a great many reasons why it is not practical and they will be developed as we proceed with the discussion. I think the gentleman will be convinced of it. I do not like to take the time now to go into that feature of it, but under the five-minute rule all of those things will be discussed.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not care, then, to divert the gentleman's attention at this time.

Mr. HENRY. You will not divert my attention at this time, but the Senate committee has been proceeding for days and days with their investigation, and if we had a joint session they might have matters in mind that might come up that would not interest the House at all while they were investigating those charges in so far as the membership of the House is concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. Do not the so-called Mulhall charges include certain Senators?

Mr. HENRY. The Senate can protect its own integrity, and for that reason we want to have free right of way to protect the integrity of the membership of this House, so that there will be no hindrance to either side in accomplishing what they desire.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not that necessitate going over the identical ground twice?

Mr. HENRY. To our mind it would not make any difference if we went over it two or three times. The question of duplication means nothing when we are defending the honor and integrity of the membership of this House.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is no more in earnest about that than I am, but it seems to me the idea of duplication is both a false economy and erroneous from every viewpoint.

Mr. HENRY. We thought there would not be any exact duplication. Here are charges against Members of this House, and we wish to go directly to them and investigate them and see if there is anything in them that is justified, and whether certain Members ought to be exonerated and others ought to be criticized or eliminated. On that account we have made the House resolution——

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT]?

Mr. HENRY. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. On page 3 of the resolution I see that this subcommittee is to have power to employ such counsel or clerical assistance as it may deem necessary and to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and there your power ceases under the resolution. I would like to ask the gentleman if when a witness has been summoned before this House committee and he absolutely declines and refuses to answer a question propounded to him what would be the remedy?

Mr. HENRY. I think there is a statutory provision in regard to that matter. That is taken care of under the general law. The House could not make this resolution have the force and effect of a statute, and for that reason we did not go into a thing that was already in the statute.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. I call the gentleman's attention to the language on lines 11 and 12, page 2. Does not the gentleman think that ought to be amended so that it will read like this, beginning with line 9:

> Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by the said National Association of Manufacturers or any agent thereof to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election, or in attempting to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election.

Mr. HENRY. I rather think that would be included in the language as stated, but have no objection to making it broader if the gentleman thinks language of that sort would improve it. I think that would improve it, and have no objection to it.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield.

Mr. REED. On page 3, line 13, it reads:

> The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress.

Is the House to understand by that that this investigation shall be deferred until Congress recesses?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, no. The Speaker has that authority while Congress is in session, but when we adjourn the authority has to be specifically conferred on him by the resolution.

Mr. REED. Then by the resolution as written it is the intention of the committee to go ahead with the investigation immediately?

Mr. HENRY. Undoubtedly; and they have the authority to do it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves the balance of his time. He has used nine minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Committee on Rules has spent the better part of three days considering the subject of this resolution. They make no apology to the House of Representatives for violating the Nation's holiday by working most of the day. We were in accord as to the general scope which the investigation authorized by this resolution should take. It took some little time to get the ideas of the committee into shape, but we finally succeeded in producing the draft of the resolution that is before the House at this time.

The chairman of the committee has stated he will not move the previous question. The resolution, therefore, will be open for amendment under the five-minute rule. It was the judgment of the committee that the resolution probably would not be materially improved by amendments offered, but while on the floor of the House the widest latitude for debate will be given, and if any amendment appeals to the House it will have the cooperation of the members of the committee.

The resolution, it will be observed, does not confine the committee which it authorizes merely to an investigation of the activities of the National Association of Manufacturers, but it authorizes an investigation also into like activities of any like association or persons, engaged either before Congress or the committees of the House; and it was the intention also to include the activities not only of the National Association of Manufacturers, but of any other association in the primary campaigns of Members of Congress and in the campaigns for election of Members of Congress, whether these associations were urging the defeat or urging the election of Members of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he does not think that the resolution ought to be amended by inserting in line 11 of page 2 the words "and any other organization or corporation or association or persons"?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have had my attention called to that matter, and have taken the matter up with other members of the committee, and I will say to the gentleman that when that part of the resolution is reached I shall offer an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What amendment is that?

Mr. CAMPBELL. On line 11, page 2, after the word "manufacturers," to insert the words "or any other association or organization or persons."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman intend to offer that amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I shall offer it if some one else does not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me further to interrupt him just a moment, while I am on my feet?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] it was deemed well to insert after the word "the," in line 12, the words "success or," and I shall at the proper time offer that amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Allow me to suggest, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the matter that the gentleman has in mind would not come up for amendment under the five-minute rule, I will yield.

Mr. TOWNER. It is in regard to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH]. I suggest that the amendment read "to accomplish the election or secure the defeat," and so forth. If the gentleman does not offer it, I will. That is, to amend by the insertion of the words "or secure the election or."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, I had that language in mind myself, but that involves the repetition of the word "election." I think it would be simpler and better grammar after the word "the" to insert the words "success or." But we can take that up when we come to the consideration of the resolution under the five-minute rule, of course.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to show to the country what has been done by every organization that has participated in politics and lobbying before the Congress and the committees of the House. We want the country to know exactly what is going on and what is being done, not only by the Manufacturers' Association but by others. We do not deny, and it was not the intention of the committee presenting this resolution to intimate, that the National Association of Manufacturers, or any other association, did not have the right to appear before committees of Congress to appeal to Members of Congress upon matters in which they were interested; but we want the country to know what association has undertaken improperly to influence the Congress, or the appointment of committees, or the action of committees, or the defeat of candidates for nomination for Congress, or the defeat of candidates for election to Congress, or the nomination of particular candidates, or the election of particular candidates. It is important that the country should know what influences are back of action taken, not only by the National Association of Manufacturers but by others.

It is well known to the Members of Congress, as it is to everybody else in public life, that for years every candidate for office receives information that the writer is the representative of so many thousands or hundreds of thousands of votes, and that these votes will be for or against him upon the condition that he is for or against certain things. We want to know, and we want the country to know, all the facts in this connection.

If a Member of Congress comes here as the agent of or having been elected by any organization, the country should know it and the Congress should know it. That is the purpose of the wide scope authorized by this resolution for investigation into these questions. The committee is unanimous in its report. I hope the resolution will be amended in certain particulars to strengthen it. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] and reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has used 10 minutes and yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution as introduced, with the amendments which may be necessary to carry out the meaning of the resolution in its general form.

It seems to me that the resolution is broad enough to cover more than the direct charges relating to the National Association of Manufacturers. It has been carefully studied and worked over, as has been suggested by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. The committee took it up on Independence Day and gave it careful study during the greater part of that day. I think special credit should be given to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] in this connection. He worked arduously on this measure and was largely instrumental in shaping it in its principal outlines.

I believe this resolution covers the phases of special privilege that we have been talking about, but knowledge of which has existed in more or less nebulous form. The Mulhall charges, as originally published, had two principal phases that came to my mind in reading them. One is that Members of Congress and employees were intimidated or purchased, and that committees were manipulated to prevent or effect the passage of legislation by the influence of the National Association of Manufacturers, and that to produce that influence certain money was spent corruptly for the nomination or election of Members of Congress or their defeat for nomination or election. That is the first phase of the charges. The second one is more important still. It is that there has been a conspiracy, a concerted attempt on the part of dishonest big business in this Nation to affect legislation, and by spies and corruption to enter into labor organizations and to impede any attempts they might make to pass remedial legislation or to benefit their condition by industrial strikes. It seems to me that is the most important phase of it, and it is covered by this resolution. The people of the country will not be satisfied to know simply whether this National Association of Manufacturers should be classed as a noble association of manufacturers or as a nefarious association of manufacturers.

It is not so much concerned as to whether or not certain Members of this Congress are models of purity or monuments of putrefaction. It seems to me that the people of the country at the present time desire to know whether or not there is a systematic attempt to change the Government which was intended to be a government of the people, for the people, and by the people into a government of dishonest business, for dishonest business, and by dishonest business, or whether it is a government of grafters, by grafters, and for grafters. That is what the people of this country want to know, and they will rest satisfied with nothing less than the whole truth. The social unrest about which we hear so much, and which exists so evidently in this Nation, is due almost solely to injustice. It is not due in any large degree to anarchists or disturbers without reason. It can only be allayed by turning the power of pitiless publicity upon the vermin that works in the dark, and then following the light with measures which will prevent such menace in the future. Its presence in this Nation is due to the well-grounded idea in the minds of the people that there has been a systematic and insidious effort to stop any progress toward social and industrial justice. That has been the idea for years past when people came to the Halls of Congress and the State legislatures and demanded something of improvement and have seen their prayers unheeded and their wishes scorned. That is the idea now, and here we have an opportunity to learn just to what extent that condition exists in the conduct of business and government and the transaction of legislative business.

And rest assured that the people will not be contented only with learning of conditions of other times. That is important; but far more important still is full and complete knowledge of what is taking place in this Congress here and now.

It seems to me that our duty is to so act that the special interests of this Nation may not sit calmly through all the flurry and excitement of such an exposé as this, knowing that they can still remain masters of the situation through their arts of crooked agents, dictated letters, and whispered words.

The people of this country demand that such unholy power shall cease. Forbearance has almost ceased to be a virtue, and their demands are coming in no uncertain terms. They have wrought a revolution in administrations in an effort to end this domination of privilege, and if that hope fails them the day of public wrath will make alarmists out of many of those who are to-day proud to be classed as conservatives.

The people want the affairs of the Nation to go on in an even and orderly fashion. But if a full and complete investigation into the activities of special privilege in thwarting just legislation is not made, and if the investigation does not end in effective control of the situation, the question will not be whether such conditions are to continue, but what will succeed them. A change is inevitable, and it will come either through ruin or reform.

I want to support this resolution with the amendments which may be necessary to carry out its intent and purpose, because it reaches that important phase of the alliance of crooked business and crooked politics, and because it will give the people the information which the people have the right to know. It will, at the same time, give an opportunity to find a remedy which will result in the bettering of such conditions. It rests with the committee, after it is appointed, as to whether or not this investigation shall be of effective use and benefit. The committee certainly is given power in this resolution to go into these matters, to discuss them thoroughly, and present some remedy for the conditions. I urge the passage of the resolution and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any further investigations. The honor and integrity of the membership of this House is far above reproach, and we should not take any notice of the unscrupulous and designing class of men who seek to defame the Members of this body.

The investigations of the United States Steel Corporation and the Money Trust have been the cause of distress in the financial and business world. They have depreciated the value of securities over $1,000,000,000. The inquisitions have proven conclusively that there was no just cause for the claim that a money trust existed and that the United States Steel Corporation purchased the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. for no other purpose than staying the panic of 1907. Not alone have the investigations proven disastrous to the public, but they were the indirect cause of the death of the greatest banker and philanthropist in the world.

These are my objections to the proposed investigation: We have an investigating committee proceeding at the present time in the Senate. Why should the country be put to further expense by having the House duplicate the work of the Senate? What happened in 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910?

We all have the utmost confidence in the Members of this body and should show our indorsement by refusing to have an investigation.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty accord with the sentiment of this resolution. While I do not think it goes far enough in its present form, yet I think by proper amendment it can be made ample to reach all of the claims that have been made through the press by the National Association of Manufacturers or by any other organization which may have exerted its influence for the purpose of the defeat of any candidate for Congress or to promote the election of such candidate. This resolution, as I understand, confines the scope of the investigation to the conduct of the Members of this and other Congresses who have been named in the public press. I am in favor of its being broadened, so that it will reach every Member of this House or any former House.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I can not yield very much of my time. I have only five minutes.

Mr. POU. I will yield the gentleman one minute of my time.

Mr. FOWLER. Very well, then I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. POU. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the wording of the resolution, beginning on line 22, on the second page:

Said committee shall also inquire whether the said National Association of Manufacturers or any other organization or corporation or association or person does now maintain or has heretofore maintained a lobby for the purpose of influencing legislation by Congress and ascertain and report.

Does not that give the committee the very widest latitude to investigate every human being?

Mr. FOWLER. A very wide latitude, indeed, but I do not care whether the influence was exerted by a lobby or by an individual. It ought to be broad enough to reach the individual Members of various Congresses——

Mr. POU. It does.

Mr. FOWLER. Who undertook to influence legislation.

Mr. POU. It does.

Mr. FOWLER. But I call the attention of the able gentleman to the language in the preamble, which says:

Certain of its Members and employees.

And each reference following the preamble limits the investigation to only these Members, which is in the following words:

Concerning said Representatives.

I want it to extend to other than said Representatives. I want it to include you and me and every other Member of this House or any former House who may have been improperly influenced in legislation or otherwise.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that if he can think of any words in the English language that will give larger latitude or more power, he can do more than I can.

Mr. FOWLER. I will offer an amendment when the resolution is taken up under the five-minute rule, if no other Member does. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call the attention of the men who control vast interests in this country to the fact that the mayor of the city of Cincinnati has been compelled, in order to save the lives and serve the people of that great city, to take charge of the ice plants of the Ice Trusts in that city. A strike is now on in the production of ice in that city, and the mayor tried to get the supply from other cities, but he was informed that they had the ice, but before shipment could be made the consent of the owners of the ice factory in Cincinnati must be had; that they had tried to get such consent, but no such consent could be secured. That left the city without ice.

I warn the men of vast control and vast influence in this country that the people to-day are thinking and believing that a secret conspiracy against the welfare of this country is no less treasonable than is the conduct of the man who shoulders a musket and joins the enemy of his country and goes upon the open field to fight against the Government of his country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I understood that I was to have an extension of one minute.

Mr. HENRY. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. FOWLER. I can not say what this Government may do, neither am I endowed to speak for anyone but myself, but I do want to say to these organizations that have tried to manipulate government for special interest that the people are searching diligently for a remedy, and their ability to find it, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, is as ample as their activity is great. And while I am not saying that any of these great masters of special interests in this country will be cited for trial for contempt or for treason, yet I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is rife in the minds of the people to-day that such might be done if it becomes necessary.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I certainly feel no personal concern in this resolution and this proposed investigation, because in my four or five years' service here I have not formed the acquaintance of any lobbyists, and I do not know of my own personal knowledge about any lobby. I dare say it is true of this legislative body as every other legislative body in the world, and will ever be until the end of time, that men of various interests in legislation will importune Members of Congress. In a general way, though not directly, I have heard of an anti-saloon league and of a saloon league, of a farmers' organization and of an antifarmers' organization; that various religious sects, various institutions, promulgating various views, have kept so-called lobbyists at the Capitol. My private opinion is that these so-called lobbyists of all the men in the world have the highest regard for the character and the integrity of Members of Congress, although I dare say they may go and report to their paymasters of the influence they wield over you.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an incorruptible, honest body of the Representatives of the people of this country. I do not believe there exists in this Nation an influence that is bad enough to seek to corrupt this great representative body, and if such a band exists, I do not believe for a moment that they could buy a corporal's guard of the Representatives of the people in the American Congress. [Applause.] If it is said that there is a lobby here to keep men from revising the tariff and relieving the burdens of the people, your best answer to it is to revise the tariff and relieve the burdens of the people. If it is said that there is a lobby here to keep you from giving a good, stable, and elastic banking and currency law, your best answer to it is not to sit idle with your hands folded, but to give the people the things which you promised to give them. In my humble belief the people look upon this Congress of men who represent the American people not as demagogic politicians, not in the light of muck-raking papers; but the great heart and soul of this Republic believes you are honest, and if there was anything to shake my faith in your integrity it would be the awful panic that a simple little statement in a newspaper would make in this body. It was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that if there is a feeling going abroad that the Congress is not pure, that this forum of the people's will is not what it should be, you ought to go home to your districts as I have done, and tell your people that it is honest and pure. Republicans have called Democrats scoundrels, and Democrats have called Republicans scoundrels in their districts, and leave the impression that you are about the only honest man in the body, so you need not wonder that muck-raking magazines and papers will make the people believe that you are dishonest. If they would tell the truth about yourself and myself to the people they would say that our worst thing is that we have not always got the courage to stand up to the rack, fodder or no fodder, and do what we honestly believe is in the interests of the American people, and that this is not a venal body. [Applause.] You know we are doing a whole lot of investigating, and I have never found any good that has come of it so far as my observation has been concerned. I hope good will come of this. If there is one rotten potato in the bin, I hope you will find it; and I hope if there is a Congressman who has soiled his hands and has taken pay from private interests to do or not to do the right thing, that you will not do what we have often done—be too cowardly to do our duty as we see it—but I hope you will drive such a Congressman from this Chamber on the toe of your boot, and let the people have an ocular demonstration of what you think of tampering with the great law-making body of this country. I doubt if you find any bribe-taking Congressman. I do not doubt you will find some who have eaten dinners with lobbyists; I do not doubt but that you will find lobbyists who believe that they have influenced Congressmen, and I do not doubt when they report to their masters, from whom they draw the $5,000 or $10,000 a year, that they will call Mr. MANN, "Jim"; Speaker CLARK, "Champ"; President Wilson, "Woodrow"; Mr. Roosevelt, "Theodore," to leave the impression that they are cheek by jowl with the great men of the Nation.

You know it is not true, Republicans; you know it is not true, Democrats. The way to make the people believe it is not to get into a panic and riot every time some liar gets himself into the public print. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, in introducing the resolution the other day providing for an investigation, I had in mind the charges appearing in the newspapers made by Mr. Mulhall. The Committee on Rules has gone fully into the question of investigation and has come to the conclusion that a sweeping investigation, and a wide one, is needed. I believe that what the people of this country want is to find out what lobbies have had their agents in Washington and have used proper and what lobbies have had their agents in Washington and have used improper influences with Members of Congress; and not alone in Washington, but in their respective districts. In reading over the resolution as presented by the committee I am in favor of it, and I hope it will pass the House with the proper amendments, suggested by the various Representatives, necessary to strengthen it and give it the widest possible scope.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution will undoubtedly receive the vote, practically, of every Member of this House, and it ought to receive the vote of every Member of this House. The Congress of the United States should not be unwilling to lay bare the act of every Member of that Congress. The country wants light and ought to have the light. But while we are laying bare our lives I believe the motives of the executive officers of this country and their actions should be laid bare also. It was a remarkable sight the other day in this House to see the Democratic majority trying to stifle debate upon a proposition that there should be a thorough exploitation of an effort that might have resulted in the defeat of justice in the matter of the white-slave prosecutions at San Francisco. You can not avoid laying bare these matters. We are determined to have the facts fully presented to the country. The effort to stick your heads in the sand like ostriches in the belief that the country will not see you will not suffice. These matters must be made public. The actions of men in public office, whether they occupy seats in Congress or whether they are at the head of powerful executive departments, should be open to the light of day; and I am glad that the minority leader of this House has not interposed a point of order of no quorum at this time, in order that this resolution should be adopted by the House as speedily as possible. Better show the country the character of men who are in Congress. The trouble is that there are men around this Capitol and men on the outside who speak to Members on public questions, as they have a right to do, and Members have the right to listen. I dare say that if a Member is free in expressing his views it is not improbable that the individual who has accosted the Member will report to his master that this Congressman is all right on this question; and it is possible that he tells his master, in order to make a show of earning the salary which he is being paid by one of these big corporations, "I have fixed Congressman So-and-So. He is all right, and you need not worry about him." If such a letter were made public, it would immediately place an innocent Member in an unenviable position. It is also within the range of possibility that the scoundrel who resorts to such practices will not hesitate to demand money from his employer, ostensibly for the Congressman, when, as a matter of fact, he sticks it into his own pocket. I understand that has been done at times around State legislatures. It may have been done here. Let us have the light. Let us investigate it all.

I have found in my interviews with Members of this House that there is not one to whom I have spoken who knows this man Mulhall. And yet he has given the impression to the country that he has constantly influenced Members of this House. I believe the investigation will disclose his statement to be a tissue of lies. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution will pass unanimously, and that light will be thrown upon all the actions of the Members of this House.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for time because of the possible uncertainty as to how long there will be an opportunity to amend the resolution.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that, beginning with line 6 on page 3, are the provisions for the meetings of the committee, and that in so far as any language in this resolution is concerned every one of those meetings can be held in secret. This same sort of a resolution permitting secret meetings of the committee of investigation was introduced at the time we proposed to have an investigation of the Ballinger trouble, but when the resolution reached the floor attention was called to it and the House adopted an amendment declaring that all meetings of that committee and of every subcommittee should be open to the public, the adoption of that amendment resulting in no meetings being held by subcommittee. All the meetings were held in public and conducted by the full committee. So I hope that there will be no adjournment to-day until we reach these provisions on page 3 and there shall be an opportunity to amend.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. COOPER. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. When the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of public meetings of the committee to which he refers, he means, of course, those meetings at which hearings were had?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, there were executive meetings of the committee.

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The meetings at which hearings were had were all public?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not suppose there will be any objection to the amendment, but as a matter of fact does the gentleman recall in his experience here any investigating committee which held meetings, which took the testimony of witnesses, which have not always been public and open for everybody who could get into the room?

Mr. COOPER. That does not meet the situation at all. I want an express prohibition in the resolution itself, so that there shall not be a possibility of a secret meeting. We should not leave it to the discretion of any committee, nor especially of a subcommittee, in a matter of this kind to hold its meetings in secret. Under this resolution they could go from this city to San Francisco, or to any other point in the United States, and hold meetings in secret there.

Mr. HENRY. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that we do not intend to have any secret meetings of the committee, and I do not think there is any intention of that kind as to the hearings. As the gentleman will recall in the matter of the Money Trust investigation and the investigation into the Sugar Trust and into the Steel Trust, those proceedings were all published. I have not the slightest objection to an amendment requiring that all these hearings be made public.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have little or no doubt that this resolution will receive practically the entire vote of this body, but it ought not to be adopted until it is made a joint resolution. I think there is not one reason, but there are many reasons why this should be done. If any Member of this House is venal or corrupt, as the charge in the newspaper states, he ought to receive the condemnation of both ends of the Capitol. If he is guilty, he ought to be expelled by both ends of the Capitol. If they are innocent, as I believe them to be, they deserve to be freed from the charges lodged against them by a joint committee and at the earliest possible time.

Another reason why this should be a joint resolution is that these charges reach both Senators and House Members. Therefore, to have a House committee start out and investigate one side of it and then have a Senate committee start out and investigate another side is a duplication of printing, is a duplication of time, is a duplication of investigaton, as well as a conflict of authority.

Suppose one committee concludes that the men accused are innocent, and suppose that the other committee concludes that they are guilty, what sort of a spectacle do you have to present to an inquiring public?

These charges name a long list of Senators and Members of the House here, and they name also a long list of ex-Senators and ex-Members. I think the chairman of the Committee on Rules and the members of the committee itself ought to make this a joint resolution and ought to make a general clean-up of this proposition.

What reason can there be for one body making an investigation and another body making the same investigation? Do you suppose that after the House committee has investigated the House Members, the Senate will sit idly by and let their Members rest under a cloud? Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be practicable for this committee, appointed by the House, and a Senate committee, appointed by the Senate, to sit jointly and have the hearings published separately, not jointly, so that in fact there will be only one examination and two reports?

Mr. FERRIS. If that is anticipated, that that course should be pursued, that is only additional logic why this should be a joint resolution. I do not know that that is intended or that they could do that under the authority conferred by this resolution of the House and of the Senate. But if that is intended to be done, this ought to be a joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that it is intended to be done, but I think it would be a very wise thing to do.

Mr. FERRIS. I think so. But how much more effective and better would be the work of a joint investigating committee that would render one verdict and upon which everybody could look! I call your attention to the fact that there will be conflict of authority and a muddle and a mess if one House should render one verdict and another House should render another verdict. I am heartily in favor of an investigation that will bring about good results and purify the membership of this House. Personally, I do not think there are venal men here sitting amongst us, and I do not think this investigation will ever prove that. I think it will prove that some irresponsible person is publishing something that will prove to be untrue, unfounded, and, in most cases, a criminal slander against some of the most respected Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have no further requests for time, and if the gentleman has no others——

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like three or four minutes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, when President Wilson challenged the attention of the country to the fact that there existed around the legislative halls in Washington insidious lobbies for the purpose of influencing legislation there was a disposition in a good many quarters to smile incredulously, a readiness to believe that nothing would result from the President's challenge. A committee was appointed in another body, a great deal in this spirit, apparently. Almost immediately after the appointment of that committee in the Senate important papers and correspondence were seized——

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not completed my sentence.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I decline to yield, because I have not completed my sentence. Papers and correspondence of importance were seized, which revealed the existence of an important lobby related to one particular interest. Following upon that exposure came the Mulhall articles. I have read them. They are in certain particulars serious. It seems to me in some respects that they are a great deal more serious as indicating the activities of the National Association of Manufacturers in its attempts to bullyrag Congressmen than in any attempt otherwise to control them. The Mulhall charges assert that the National Association of Manufacturers was an organization of business men maintaining an organization within it which went about over the United States attempting to corrupt labor unions, attempting to buy labor-union men, in order to disrupt such organizations, discredit the movement, and bring the cause of union labor into disrepute. The charge is made in one instance that money was given to a Congressman to attempt to bribe labor leaders in his district. The charge is made specifically that a man was hired upon the floor of this House to spy upon Members. The charge is made that the former titular head of this House, along with the party whip of one of the parties in this House, prepared lists of Members who were to be warred upon because they would not do the bidding of the National Association of Manufacturers. Now, as I have said, I read these articles very carefully. I have believed for years that the personnel of some of the committees of this House were manipulated against certain remedial legislation. Whether it was done at the behest of the National Association of Manufacturers or not I did not know, but I was convinced that it was done. I was one of a group of Members who made a fight upon that and kindred propositions, and we had to meet penalties for making that fight.

I picked up one of the Mulhall articles the other day, and I read this——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like a couple of minutes more of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. MURDOCK. This article which I will read details some of the charges made by Mulhall:

Just after the convening of Congress in 1909–1910, Col. Mulhall received the assistance of Watson in preparing a list of Representatives whose presence in Congress seemed to him to be of inimical interest to the National Association of Manufacturers. In the report to Secretary Schwedtman on March 17, 1909, Col. Mulhall said:

"I had a long interview with Mr. Watson this morning and submitted to him for his advice a list of men who are continually opposing us in Congress, which I thought it would be a good idea to get into the hands of the leaders of our association, so that we could commence early to educate those men to be fair and not such strenuous advocates for labor bills and class legislation. The list comprises Mr. William Hughes, of the sixth New Jersey district; Mr. James McDermott, of the fourth Illinois district; Mr. Champ Clark, of the ninth Missouri district, Mr. Harry L. Maynard, of the second Virginia district; Mr. Henry A. Cooper, of the first Wisconsin district; Mr. Henry C. Loudenslager, of the first New Jersey district; Mr. Ebenezer J. Hill, of the fourth Connecticut district; Mr. John L. Burnett, of the seventh Alabama district; Mr. Thomas D. Nichols, of the tenth Pennsylvania district (now seated, but his seat will be contested); Mr. Herbert Parsons, of the thirteenth New York district; George A. Pearre, of the sixth Maryland district; Mr. William B. Wilson, of the fifteenth Pennsylvania district; Mr. William S. Greene, of the thirteenth Massachusetts district; Augustus P. Gardner, of the sixth Massachusetts district; Gilbert N. Haugen, of the fourth Iowa district; Victor Murdock, of the eighth Kansas district; E. A. Morse, of the tenth Wisconsin district; Lenroot, of the eleventh Wisconsin district (new Member); John M. Nelson, of the second Wisconsin district. The last six on this list have been placed there by Speaker Cannon and Mr. James E. Watson. Watson says these people have always been against anything that we ever wanted since he has been a Member of the House. This includes the entire list, and he thinks that we ought to start in to make war upon this list at the first opportunity offered."

Now, Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress, I have no objection to the agent of any organization in the United States coming to that door or coming to me in my office and asking me to support or oppose legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like a couple of minutes more.

Mr. HENRY. I have agreed to yield the remainder of my time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent to conclude, in two minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has no time left. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be extended for two minutes and that the gentleman from Kansas have those two minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas be given two minutes more, not to be counted in the hour. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, when organizations come here and seek to influence a Member of Congress by persuasion, no one can have objection; but when a man representing a powerful organization comes to this door and seeks to control a Member either by the threat to use money against him in his district or by offering to contribute money to aid in his campaign, it is beyond the bounds of decency; it is a thing that can not be too quickly condemned by Congress. The National Association of Manufacturers is under the charge of repeatedly using money in districts to aid Members of Congress to be elected that they might be placed on important committees to defeat remedial legislation which the people of the country demanded.

This resolution as reported seems to be thorough. It grants the committee power to go into all the avenues of this exposure, and if the committee is industrious, if it will hold open meetings, as it ought to do, and as every committee, standing and select, in this House should, then we will get results from this investigation, and results which will be of benefit not only to the country, to progressive legislation, but to the Members of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has four minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have not taken these charges which have been made quite so seriously as many Members of the House apparently have. I do not believe there is corruption in the House. If I were to make a charge against the House of Representatives, I should say that there were no corrupt men in the House, but that there was a plentiful supply of cowards. I do not believe that many men on the floor of the House are influenced in their votes or their position by the active lobbyists who appear in Washington, but that they are often influenced in their position and their votes by fear of what may happen to them in their districts is undoubtedly true. Since I have been a Member of the House I have learned to pay respect and give admiration to the Member on either side who experience has taught me did what he believed was right, regardless of what some organization or other interest might think about it, or regardless of threats that were made. I do not see any more objection to the National Manufacturers' Association, or the labor organizations, or the antisaloon leagues, or the liquor interests, or the Christian Scientists, or the American Medical Association, or the American Association for Medical Freedom, or any other association endeavoring to influence votes for or against a Member of Congress in his district, and perhaps spending money for that purpose, than I do to any other political campaign, and not half as much objection to it as for a Member of Congress on the Chautauqua platform in another man's district to denounce that other man as unfit to be a Representative in Congress. I think that is rather taking an unfair advantage. I do not know how extensively that may have been done.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for now more than 16 years. I believe I have written more laws upon the statute books than any other Member of Congress in this or the other House. I have had the honor to have charge of more important bills in this House than any other Member of the House, and I never have met with this "insidious" lobby. It may be that I am too innocent, or it may be that I am too severe. It has never come in contact with me. I heard talk about a great lobby when the pure-food bill was under consideration. I never met the lobby in Washington. I met the cowardice of men on the floor of this House who, temporarily at least, were afraid of influences in their own districts which, through correspondence from home, they were led to believe existed. I have seen this House and its Members receive letters and postal cards by the thousands, perhaps the hundreds of thousands, from the most powerful lobby I ever saw, in connection with the House, when the oleomargarine bill was under discussion; but that lobby was not here. The lobby was at home, and it was not an unlawful lobby and probably or possibly not an improper lobby and not an improper influence; but men on the floor of the House, when that bill was under consideration, as when many others are under consideration, told you and will tell you privately that they believed one way and proposed to vote the other way. That is only human nature. I do not undertake to criticize them.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this investigation will show that the American Congress and its Members are incorruptible and honest, filled with honor and a desire to promote the best interests of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, possibly it is fair for me to state that I approve of this resolution, and I make that statement in view of my insistence the other day on having the question considered then. I am sure that my colleague [Mr. FERRIS] would not raise an objection on the score that it ought to be a joint resolution, if he would take a second thought and understand that the power over the membership of this body and over the Senate are separate powers and that it could not be controlled so thoroughly as by a separate committee. And, besides that, if two committees will investigate and do duplicate work, it will show in the end when the conclusions are found that if they are together the American people will believe that there is no whitewash, and if they should disagree, then a discussion would come up as to why they would disagree. I am not one of those who believe that there are many dishonest men in this House. I do not know, because I have not been here very long, but I would be ashamed to remain here if I believed there were many dishonest men in this House. In fact, I would not serve in any legislative or deliberative body composed of crooks. On the other hand, I am not ready to say that this man who makes this charge is wholly false. Perhaps here and there he told a partial truth. We must remember that, after all, the worst lie in the world is a partial truth. I consider that, so far as the statement made with reference to the list beginning with President Taft and running down to and including the distinguished Member from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], that statement alone does not charge them with anything that is wrong. It is only its publication with other charges that seem to be true. I apprehend that employees in the service of the House have been, more than any Member would be, subject to criticism and condemnation. We should merely proceed upon the idea that we are seeking the truth and the whole truth and not a partial statement. If we see that a Member is not guilty as charged we should say so, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I simply desire to finish this sentence—and on the other hand, if Mulhall is false and has made a false statement we ought to say so, and the committee ought to include that in its findings.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. NEELEY].

Mr. NEELEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that my good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] forgets one very material matter in arguing against a House committee and in favor of a joint inquiry into the lobby charges, and that is the testimony of two witnesses who have recently occupied the witness stand before the Senate Committee. These two men have claimed to be the authors of almost all the remedial legislation that has been enacted by Congress during my lifetime. They have made statements under oath so broad that the entire country must soon be convinced of their evident insincerity, with the consequent result that the Senate investigation will be lowered in dignity and its findings belittled in the estimation of the entire country. I do not believe that a committee of this House would permit any witness to come before it and tell them under oath that he and he alone was responsible for the creation of the Department of Commerce, created the Department of Labor, was the author of the child-labor law, was the author of the eight-hour law, drew the resolution to investigate the Steel Trust, drew the resolution to investigate the Money Trust, and was himself directly responsible for all of the other legislation and resolutions that he enumerates, and then leave the presence of that committee and of that room without having the entire matter checked up to him in a manner that would call the attention of the country to his deliberate misstatement of facts.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that if that investigation proceeds as it is now proceeding, it will soon be the joke of the country, as it has begun to be the joke of Washington. There is not a Member of this House but who knows that many of the statements of each of these two witnesses was absolutely untrue, and in my judgment it indicates a deliberate attempt upon the part of certain unseen forces to belittle the investigation, lower its dignity in the eyes of the country, and result in a whitewash that will permit any guilty to escape.

This House should have a committee chosen from its membership who are determined to get the facts and all the facts for the country. This committee should spare none, protect none, persecute none; and if any individual has the brazen effrontery to come before it and in its presence make a statement of such astounding untruthfulness, as the newspaper reports indicate have been made to the Senate committee, the House committee should lose no time in presenting proper charges of perjury and seeing that prosecutions are based thereon. This House can not permit the Senate investigation to embrace matters which directly concern it and its integrity and thus escape its responsibility. It should disclose the facts exactly as they are without fear or favor, and permit the country to make its judgment based thereon, without regard to anybody or anything.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired and the Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the word "seven," in line 2, on page 1, be stricken out and the word "eight" inserted.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, why?

Mr. HENRY. Well, if there is any objection, I withdraw it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, is the paragraph open to amendment at that point?

The SPEAKER. The paragraph is open to amendment——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then I move to strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first finish the reading of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there have appeared in recent issues of various newspapers published in the United States divers statements and charges as to the existence and activity of a lobby organized by and on behalf of an organization known as the National Association of Manufacturers for the purpose of improperly influencing legislation by Congress, the official conduct of certain of its members and employees, the appointment and selection of committees of the House, and for other purposes designed to affect the integrity of the proceedings of the House of Representatives and its Members: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker appoint a select committee of seven Members of the House, and that such committee be instructed to inquire into and report upon all the matters so alleged concerning said Representatives, and more especially whether during this or any previous Congress the lobbyists of the said National Association of Manufacturers, or the said association through any officer, agent, or member thereof, did in fact reach or influence, whether for business, political, or sympathetic reasons or otherwise, the said Representatives or any one of them or any officer or employee of this or any former House of Representatives in or about the discharge of their official duties; and if so, when, by whom, and in what manner.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 2, by inserting in place of the word "seven" the word "nine."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 2, page 1, by striking out the word "seven" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "nine."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I think this committee should be larger. It will be an exceedingly important committee, as everyone knows, and I believe the American people will have a great deal more confidence in its reports if we have a large committee than if we have a small one. There is a kind of a prevailing sentiment concerning a small committee that a little coterie of men may possibly go off by themselves and prepare a whitewashing report. This resolution authorizes a subcommittee of this committee of seven to conduct hearings. If you are going to have a subcommittee of three men go off and make an investigation of ourselves—and that is what this investigation is—and come back and report that we are all as white as snow and our accusers are all villains, the American people are not going to swallow with a great deal of grace that kind of a report coming from two or three men.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman's amendment carries and the committee consists of nine, how would the gentleman expect the committee to be divided on the two sides of the aisle?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, as a matter of fact, I suppose it ought to be five Democrats and four Republicans. I am not particular; that is a matter of detail. I would personally rather see the committee composed of 15 members. I believe the investigation would carry a great deal more weight with 15 than with 7 members; and I also believe the Speaker should, in making the appointments, have more latitude in representing not only a larger part of the country but in representing what may be considered the various interests or sentiments of the people on the floor of this House, so that when the report ultimately comes in the people would feel that the investigation had been fair and thorough and was not any little whitewashing affair. I want to see a genuine investigation by a large and representative committee. Therefore I feel it would look much better and be much better to increase the number from seven to nine, at least.

I coincide with what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has said. I believe if it was a joint committee of the Senate and House it would be very much better. Charges are made against both Senators and Representatives. We can not investigate one without considering the other. Suppose in this investigation the House committee should find that some of the Senators had been improperly influenced and the Members had not. What position would the House be in in making a report to that effect? I think the committee should not be limited to matters affecting ourselves and the House, but have authority to investigate all charges against both the Senate and House. I believe it would carry more weight if it was a joint committee of both Houses. But if it is not a joint committee, let us have a committee large enough so that it will carry weight before the American people.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not concur with my good friend from Colorado in the idea that the committee should be larger or should be as large as that proposed by him, namely, nine members. This committee is, of course, a special committee which, under the terms of the resolution, will not have legislative powers. It is charged with the specific duty of investigation. So far as I remember in my experience in this body no investigating committee charged with duties similar to this committee has consisted of more than six members. There have been some investigating committees——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It would not cost the Government a nickel more to have 15 members on the committee than it would to have 7, would it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no; it would not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As a matter of fact, the House is not and will not be doing anything here during the next 60 days, will it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that it does not cost more, provided, of course, the committee does the work here. If the committee travels and their expenses are paid, it will cost more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The question of expense is not involved in numbers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennesse. As I say, not unless they travel.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And we are not very busy at the present time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why can we not have 15 men working here as well as 7, and why is there not nearly always safety in numbers?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think that the answer to that is that the work of this committee can be more expeditiously done by a small committee. I will say this, Mr. Speaker, I had some experience upon one investigating committee on which there were nine members—not a committee of this character—and there was frequently a great deal of trouble to get a quorum of that committee there, and frequently we had to proceed without a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In just a moment. For illustration, now, we have 11 members on the Committee on Rules, and yet on the day before yesterday, when we first took up this proposition, if the point of no quorum had been made we would have had to stop our work.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman's committee had numbered only seven, would it have been easier to get a quorum?

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; we had just five members there. I think a committee of this size will do the work more expeditiously than a committee of nine. That is the sole reason why I oppose an increase in the number of members on the committee.

Now does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] want to ask me a question?

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question—possibly it is unnecessary now—whether he thinks any committee of the House as at present constituted has a quorum in town, or has had a quorum in town for some time, or whether we could get a quorum of a committee of 15 in town?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know about the other committees, but there is a quorum of the Committee on Rules in town.

Mr. MANN. There was yesterday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; but there was not on the day before yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I desire to say now.

Mr. MANN. I venture to say that the Committee on Appropriations, for example, has not had a quorum of its membership in town for the last two months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The Committee on Appropriations had a meeting on Monday, at which a quorum was present. There is always a majority of the members of that committee present in the city, regardless of weather conditions, and it is a matter of a good deal of satisfaction to the chairman of that committee that the members, regardless of their political affiliations, are so conscientious and faithful about their duties.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, 13 members would not be a lucky number for this investigating committee? Inasmuch as that is the number that is dear to the President and the President has suggested the insidiousness of the lobby about the Capitol, why not make the membership of this investigation committee 13? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the remarks I made in answer to the questions of my friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] would apply with even more force in reply to the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], that the number of members be changed to nine instead of seven, as suggested by the committee.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. In line 5, page 2, after the word "them," insert "or other Representatives."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would my colleague yield to me in reference to that?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. My colleague is endeavoring to cover the same thing as that on which I was going to offer an amendment.

Would it not be better to amend by inserting "or any other Representative," so that it would read "any other Representative or officer or employee of this or any former House"?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. The word "any" might be stricken out. Let it read "or any other Representative."

Mr. MANN. So that it would read "any Representative of this or any former House"?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from Illinois what his amendment accomplishes?

Mr. FOWLER. It is for the purpose of widening the scope of the investigation beyond the men who are charged in the press.

Mr. HENRY. So as to make the language more certain.

Mr. MANN. The language of the resolution refers only to certain Representatives.

Mr. FOWLER. They are named in the preamble.

Mr. MANN. And in the article referred to.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; and they are mentioned in the preamble. I do not mean the names, but they are referred to.

Mr. HENRY. We have no objection to that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, as the gentleman amends this resolution, it will empower the committee to investigate the conduct of any Member of Congress whether included in the Mulhall charges or not?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. We think that is understood to be included.

Mr. FOWLER. In line 5, page 2, after the word "them," insert "or any other Representative"; also strike out the word "any" after the word "or," in same line, at the beginning of the sentence.

Mr. MANN. Before the word "officer"?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; before the word "officer."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 5, by inserting after the word "them," the words "or any other Representative," and strike out the second word "any" in line 5.

The SPEAKER. You had better take these amendments one at a time. What is the first change which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] wishes to make?

Mr. FOWLER. My suggestion is, in line 5, page 2, after the word "them," to insert the words "or any other Representative."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the word "any," in line 5, before the word "officer."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 5, page 2, by striking out the word "any" before the word "officer."

Mr. MANN. The purpose of that is to make it apply to any other officer or Representative of this or any other House, so that it will cover Representatives in former Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 5, by striking out the word "any" before the word "officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers or any agent thereof to accomplish the defeat for nomination or election of any candidate for the House of Representatives of Congress, and said committee shall likewise inquire whether Members of Congress have been employed by said association for the accomplishment of any improper purpose whatever.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment on behalf of the committee, by agreement with the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "the," insert "nomination or election, or secure the."

Mr. MANN. Let us hear it as it would read.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Read it as it will be.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as it would read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

To accomplish the nomination or election, or secure the defeat for nomination or election.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I have an amendment which is intended to cover the same matter which I think would be better. Can I offer it now, or shall I offer it as a substitute?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may offer it as an amendment to the amendment or as a substitute for the amendment, either one.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Then I offer it as a substitute for the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out, on page 2, line 11, all after the word "to," and strike out all of line 11, on page 2, that precedes the word "nomination" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "secure or prevent the."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I think my suggestion is briefer and that it covers the ground entirely. It would read in this way:

Or any agent thereof, to secure or prevent the nomination or election of any candidate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, of course what the House has in mind is the desire to find out whether money was used or any improper influence was exerted in any district in the United States to bring about the nomination of any particular man or to prevent the nomination of any particular man or men, and whether any influence was improperly exerted or any money used for the purpose of electing or defeating any man at the general election. Now, it is not very material what language is used to cover it. I really think, though, that the language as it stands in the resolution as reported is ample and complete to enable the committee to get at the truth; but that objection was made, and it was believed that it could be improved somewhat. My first suggestion was to insert the words "or prevent," but I will say frankly, upon the suggestion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], he thought the other language would be a little better, and I agreed to introduce that instead of the other. I think it accomplishes the end and is just as clear and plain as the language of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, this is not a very important matter, but the language will be much clearer and briefer to insert those words "to secure or prevent the nomination or election of any candidate for Representative in Congress." That covers the entire ground. It is much briefer and clearer than the language used in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit the Clerk to report the language as it would read if the amendment were adopted?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk do that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers, or any agent thereof, to accomplish the nomination or election or secure the defeat for nomination or election of any candidate for the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I submit the language that I present covers the entire matter fully and thoroughly and uses only one-half the words. I will ask that my amendment be read as it would appear if adopted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to hear the paragraph as it would read if the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers or any agent thereof to secure or prevent the nomination or election.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think the language contained in the amendment that I propose is amply clear and will simplify the matter. I ask for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I ask that it be voted down.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 12, by inserting, after the word "the" in line 12, the words "nomination or election or secure the."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Would there be a difference between a man giving money to accomplish a defeat and an investigation of that and a man giving money in attempting to accomplish a defeat?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think if the gentleman will permit me, that taken in connection with the language above—

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association, etc.—

Exerted to accomplish—I think it would be really almost tautology to put in the words "or attempt." I think it is perfectly clear and plain, and I do not think there will be the slightest difficulty about its construction by either the committee or by any person appearing before the committee. I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma for the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have another committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 14, page 2, after the word "of," insert the words "the House of Representatives of."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman. He there repeats the language "House of Representatives of Congress." I do not recall ever before having heard that descriptive title applied to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will be perfectly willing, and I think the committee probably might consent, to strike out the words "of Congress" in both places, but there is nothing inaccurate about it.

Mr. MANN. It is strictly accurate, except that it is really bad English.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not agree with the gentleman that it is bad English. The Constitution defines what the Congress shall consist of—that it shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. I do not think it is inaccurate or bad English.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it conveys the proper impression; that it refers to this House of Representatives. You might as well say "the Senate of Congress." When you use the expression "Senate of Congress" the gentleman at once sees the incongruity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That does not sound very well.

Mr. MANN. The other does not sound any better. I can understand how it happened to creep in here, but we have always considered that this was a body dignified enough to say "House of Representatives" and that was sufficient.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit this amendment to be voted upon, I will ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "of Congress," in line 13 and in lines 14 and 15.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the words "of Congress," in line 13, and the same words in lines 14 and 15, be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, lines 13, 14, and 15, by striking out the words "of Congress."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "Manufacturers," insert "or other persons, associations, or organization."

Mr. MANN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that the words inserted there would make the words "or any agent thereof"——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, no; that leaves that all right. I will ask the Clerk to report it as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee shall also inquire whether money has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers or other persons, associations, or organization, or any agent thereof, etc.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The meaning is carried out throughout. I will ask for a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting after the word "association," in line 15, the words "or have knowingly aided said association," making it read:

Have been employed by said association or have knowingly aided said association for the accomplishment of any improper purpose whatever.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 15, by adding after the word "association," the words "or have knowingly aided said association."

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I call attention to the fact that the amendment already adopted refers now to the National Manufacturers' Association or any other association or organization. It seems to me that whatever language is adopted here ought to conform with that so it would be by said associations or any of them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That will make it conform to the former amendment. I adopt the suggestion of my colleague.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the amendment reported.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. "Or have knowingly aided said associations or any of them," and so forth.

The Clerk read as follows:

Or have knowingly aided said associations or any of them.

Mr. MANN. To be inserted after the word "association."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Let us have it read in connection with the text.

The Clerk read as follows:

Have been employed by said association or have knowingly aided said associations or any of them for the accomplishment of any improper purpose whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the numerous amendments will need editing in order to make the numbers and persons conform.

Mr. MANN. I think that is all right.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. In the same connection, if my colleague will offer an amendment to insert before the word "said" the words "any of," so that it would read "employed by any of said associations," that would make the language conform to the amendment already agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is right. Line 15, after the word "by," insert the words "any of."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, insert after the word "by" the words "any of."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In that connection, the letter "s" ought to be added, making the word "association" read "associations." I think it ought to be edited to make those things agree.

Mr. MANN. We will have to edit them here. We can not expect the enrolling clerk to edit them. He does enough. He corrects our punctuation.

The SPEAKER. The amendment adding the letter "s" will be adopted, without objection.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I was trying to make an inquiry. Several in my vicinity did not understand the question before the House, and therefore I put the inquiry before the question was put. I could not understand, and the gentleman at my right was not able to understand.

The SPEAKER. If there is any difficulty about it, we will have the amendment reported again.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, it simply inserts, in line 15, after the word "by," the words "any of," and then makes the word "association" read "associations." That harmonizes with amendments already put in.

Mr. COOPER. Line 15, after the word "by"?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. After the word "by." Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "money," in line 9, page 2, the following words, to wit: "or any other thing of value."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take time enough to think for a moment myself, and perhaps it would not hurt if other Members would take the time to think. It says that the said committee shall also inquire whether money or any other thing of value has been used or improper influence exerted by said National Association of Manufacturers or any other persons, organizations, or associations. Now, this is not an improper use of money or any other thing of value, or the proper use of money or any other thing of value. These Members of Congress here are supposed to have filed a statement in accordance with the publicity act. I believe every Member here has not filed a statement, but he is supposed to have filed it. Some of those statements are quite long, showing the amount of money that has been contributed. I do not know whether "any other thing of value" has been mentioned in the statements, although the law requires that, nor how far back this goes. I hope that this committee will be able to have some scope of work that it may perform. It may be desirable to make the inquiry whether the Republican congressional committee or the Democratic congressional committee—up to date we can not make inquiry as to the Bull Moose congressional committee—have sent out literature into a district for the purpose of accomplishing the defeat or election of Members of Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind but that the purpose which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] desires to accomplish is fully covered by the words "improper influence."

Mr. MANN. Well, I am quite content that the committee should have power to inquire as to any improper influence from any source whatever, and I only took the floor for the purpose of thinking while I was talking as to whether it was desirable to have the committee undertake to inquire as to every form of influence which may be exerted by anybody in the United States properly in reference to the election or defeat of a candidate for Congress, either at the polls in November or for nomination.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] might tend to confuse rather than to clarify the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that money is only one form of a thing of value that may be used corruptly to control legislation. I have heard of men being given things of value other than money. I see no reason why this amendment should not be adopted. There might be some quibble about what "money" meant, what it was, what it included. Suppose a man were given a check; suppose he were given a draft; suppose he were given something that represents money. It might be contended that such a case was not within the language of the resolution under which the committee was acting.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think it is absolutely covered by the words "improper influence." I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 5, after the word "heretofore," add the following: "Provided, That the work of the said committee shall be limited to the investigation of the matters referred to in the preamble of this resolution until report has been submitted to the House thereon."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a unanimous intention on the part of all here to investigate these charges as quickly and as efficiently and as effectively as possible. There are two ways to defeat the purposes of this investigation. One is to so spread it out and dissipate it by bringing many foreign things into it that the committee at the outset could be deluged with matters entirely immaterial, and thus the investigation of the main things at issue be delayed until the country and the House and everybody else have become tired of the situation. Another way would be for the committee purposely to disregard the wishes of the House by arbitrarily smothering the investigation.

Now, then, I think that if we compel the committee by this resolution to report on those things that are referred to in the preamble to this resolution before they go into any of these other investigations, we would be better off. If the committee were permitted to meet and first begin the investigation of the lobbying of the Antisaloon League, and then of the medical organizations and the labor organizations, and things of that kind, it might be doing something that some Members of the House want to be done, but it would not be accomplishing what good faith in the present issue demands or what the committee under this resolution is really appointed for. I hope that the House will restrict the work of the committee to the things that are mentioned in this preamble—and that is very broad—all the Mulhall charges. Restrict the work to that until that is accomplished and a report submitted, and then go to the other things and let them investigate to their pleasure all these other things, which serve in the main merely to muddy the waters.

There is enough in these Mulhall charges to keep the committee busy for months. The operations of this Manufacturers' Association ramify in a dozen different directions and touch many other organizations. I favor investigating thoroughly. It is impossible to have too much light, but it is always the game to bring so many subjects into an investigation as to let the fellows who have most to fear escape.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], if finally adopted by the House, will result, unless the House is careful, in precisely what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has just said ought to be avoided.

Now, then, the Senate has the papers in the Mulhall charges. It will be difficult, I presume, at first for the House to get hold of them. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] directs the committee to proceed at once to the investigation of the Anti-Saloon League and other things; and then it could—probably it would not—say that it had gotten so far into that that it had postponed the Mulhall charges, involving this matter of the alleged corruption of the Members of the House, and so forth, until a later period.

I think what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has said is well grounded, and that the House ought to direct the committee to begin upon these charges which reflect immediately upon the integrity of the House, practically as a whole, before it proceeds to do anything else. The preamble strikes me as being broad enough, and I regret very much that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas was adopted in the place at which it was adopted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, personally I have no doubt that the primary interest of the House, at this time at least, is in the charges in the so-called Mulhall statement in so far as they reflect upon Members of Congress. Not only that, but I think the primary duty of the committee is as regards the Members of the present Congress who are mentioned in that article. I will say I have no doubt that unless some peculiar reason or circumstance arises to cause the committee to do otherwise it will probably devote itself to that investigation at the very first. Of course I do not know how that will be, but I assume that that would be the case.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The Senate committee has the Mulhall papers. How can the House get them?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was about to say that it is currently reported in the press—that is all the information I have about it—that the Senate committee has possession of the Mulhall papers. Now, I do not know how far the House can go in obtaining them. I do not know whether the Senate committee has obtained those papers under subpœna or whether they have simply been turned over by the New York paper. This resolution does provide that the committee shall have the right to report at any time. Now, of course, the committee can make a partial report or it can make a complete report.

So far as the matter of vindicating or condemning Members of the House may be concerned, I have no doubt that the testimony which will be taken along that line will be widely published, and will reach all the people of the United States, and people will have made up their minds long before the committee makes its report as to those matters. I think it will be well to leave it to the discretion of the committee. I am in sympathy with the idea that there ought first to be a report as to the Members of this House who are involved. I do not think there is any doubt about that, but I think it is very proper to leave it to the committee.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state what I know in reference to these papers and about Col. Mulhall himself being subpœnaed as a witness before the Senate committee.

The chairman of the Committee on Rules had a telegram from the New York World to the effect that they had turned over to Senator Reed, of the Senate committee, about 20,000 letters and telegrams, documents, and so forth, pertaining to this transaction, and that they requested Col. Mulhall to come to Washington and to appear before the committee as a witness.

This telegram also said that they would request the Senate committee to turn these documents over to the House committee when they had finished with them, and would urge Col. Mulhall to appear before the House committee, so that we might have free access to the documents and have Col. Mulhall's testimony; and I apprehend there will be no difficulty about our securing the papers whenever we shall need them, or about having Col. Mulhall appear before the House committee.

Mr. COOPER. I understand the gentleman to say that they will be turned over to the House when the Senate has finished with them. How long does the gentleman think it will take the Senate committee to finish with 20,000 letters and telegrams?

Mr. HENRY. I do not think there will be any practical difficulty about that. I think we will be able to get the papers promptly. I do not think there will be any desire on their part to deprive us of the testimony. I am not looking for anything of that sort. I think they will cooperate with us. In fact, I am sure they will. They will finish as fast as they can, and as soon as they get through with the documents they will turn them over to us.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. On yesterday the committee spent much time in discussing the purpose of the amendment that the gentleman has offered. We were unanimous in the opinion that the first duty of this committee authorized by this resolution was to inquire into the charges affecting the integrity of Members of this House, and we were of the opinion that a committee appointed by the Speaker to carry out the purposes of the resolution would, in the performance of their work, take notice of the first duty that they owed as a committee of this House to inquire into the specific charges made against the Members now sitting and ascertain the truth or falsity of the charges alleged against them. But I would not like to see so sweeping an amendment as the one offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] adopted at this time, for fear it might be construed into a restriction of the operations of this committee as a whole into inquiring only into the Mulhall charges, so called. I would be unwilling to spend three days in the preparation of a resolution authorizing a committee to inquire merely into the charges made by this individual. The charges that he made could have been investigated by a resolution or a motion made from the floor of the House three or four days ago. We have prepared a resolution here that calls for an investigation of any operations by any other association or person like those referred to by this individual who made the charges in certain newspapers. I believe that the committee appointed by this resolution in the performance of its duties will take notice of the first thing that should be done, and that is to inquire into the charges against Members now sitting in the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that in offering an amendment of this kind to this resolution I have offered one that receives the indorsement of all who have spoken. Everyone says that the purposes of the amendment are right, and that the idea ought to be carried out, but there seems to be some hesitancy in incorporating the idea in the resolution. I think that while it may be correct that all these other things ought to be investigated, we ought to go into this job face foremost, we ought to go into it right side up, and we ought not to back into it from the outside. We ought to take these charges and investigate them. The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. CAMPBELL] says that he would not care to spend three days' time preparing a resolution to investigate the charges by this man Mulhall, but the President of the United States just a few days ago made practically the same charge, only he did not mention any names. He said that there was an insidious lobby here. The things that Mr. Mulhall says have occurred, if they have, would constitute an insidious lobby. We are now confronting this proposition by an amendment which carries out and embodies the ideas and purposes of the House, and why it can not be put into the resolution I can not see.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman knows that it is impossible to tell, until after the committee is raised, just what it can do, to begin with, just how it can go to work. It is impossible to tell whether or not the committee can obtain witnesses immediately. This is a very broad and sweeping resolution. It is going to take a long time in all probability to develop the testimony and work out the report that is called for under the broad provisions of the resolution.

Suppose it should be a matter of a week or 10 days before that committee were able to reach a witness who could tell a single thing about this publication in the New York World and the Chicago Tribune, known as the Mulhall charges? Does not the gentleman think it would be well if it were able to go on with some other things? The gentleman's amendment is not confined to a report upon this proposition first, but it would absolutely prevent the committee from examining witnesses on anything until it has got through with the names of those mentioned.

Mr. BRYAN. Here is what the amendment would restrict it to:

> Whereas there have appeared in recent issues of various newspapers published in the United States divers statements and charges as to the existence and activity of a lobby organized by and on behalf of an organization known as the National Association of Manufacturers for the purpose of improperly influencing legislation by Congress, the official conduct of certain of its members and employees, the appointment and selection of committees of the House and for other purposes designed to affect the integrity of the proceedings of the House of Representatives and its Members.

I submit that Representative SHERLEY would be glad to be called instantly. I submit that Representative WEBB would like to be called instantly. I submit that every Member of this House who has been named or who desires to appear or have anyone appear or who knows anything to substantiate these charges will be glad to start the investigation at once. They are very broad charges. They enter into nearly every phase of national activity. There are several officers of the National Association of Manufacturers. If one of them is testifying—if Mr. Van Cleve is testifying—we can call the treasurer or the secretary. The record shows that that association appropriated one half million dollars for purposes of education during the period in question. We can call for the financial officer of that association to come and tell us about it. That is the subject about which the people want to hear. They do not want to hear about these other multifarious propositions until we have finished with this main subject, and I submit that if for want to time, or because of any of the other suggestions the gentleman has made, this committee narrows the proposition into an investigation of the Grange or any other organization, it can take all summer or all winter on that one subject, and we ought not to get started on side issues, but we ought to get started on the main subject.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to be heard for a few moments. There is still another reason that, in my judgment, ought to be influential in securing the adoption of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington, and that is this: It should be remembered by Members of this House that this resolution contemplates, as it is introduced and as it is being considered originally to-day, an investigation of the Mulhall charges. It should be remembered that the amendment that has been offered here by the gentleman from Kansas extends that inquiry. It is very likely, once we adopt this amendment, that it will be considered and reported that this House, in order to dissipate this inquiry, in order to prolong it, in order, perhaps, to defeat its real purpose, which means the investigation of the Mulhall charges, is going to investigate everything else, and so come to these Mulhall charges after the witnesses may have disappeared, after the interest by the public in the matter may have subsided, after the real object and purpose of this inquiry may have been forgotten.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be certainly wise for us, having enlarged the scope of the inquiry, at the same time to say distinctly that this matter of the Mulhall charges shall be investigated and reported on first. [Applause.] Further than that, Mr. Speaker, I see no difficulty whatever in regard to having plenty to do for this committee. As is suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], we can very easily commence by all the Members of Congress who have been referred to in this investigation appearing and testifying before this committee. The Senate has already had ample opportunity to dispose of part of the matter, and it can be turned over to us as it may be needed. There will be no difficulty whatever in this committee to-morrow commencing upon this investigation and finding plenty of work to occupy it until it shall have finished its investigation of these particular charges, and then the committee will have all the time for the other charges.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will permit the committee to go over until Monday.

Mr. TOWNER. I am very glad to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee. I accept the gentleman's suggestion. That is all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] if he is not trying to get this amendment in at a place he did not desire to have it appear?

Mr. BRYAN. I originally intended to put it in another paragraph, but then I altered my plan because I thought I would pull the thing off a little bit earlier.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be inserted after the word "heretofore."

Mr. BRYAN. The reading clerk came to me and we changed that.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I asked to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. BRYAN. As I suggested the amendment it was to page 3, after the word "heretofore," in line 5, but we changed it so as to make it follow the word "whatever," in line 16, page 2.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the amendment again reported, if the gentleman has located where it is to go.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "whatever," add the following: "Provided, The work of said committee shall be limited to an investigation of the matter referred to in the preamble of this resolution until report has been submitted to the House thereon."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am very bitterly opposed to this amendment. I can not understand the object for which it is presented. Certainly gentlemen are not afraid of having the investigation go beyond the influence of the National Association of Manufacturers, but that is what the amendment means. Why are gentlemen so anxious to confine this investigation to the activities of one out of many associations who have been lobbyists, it is said, in Washington, or at least used influence in the country outside of Washington? Why are gentlemen so desirous of preventing the committee, when it has obtained a lead in this investigation which goes outside of the Mulhall charges, from following up that lead? Why are gentlemen so anxious when it has obtained information not covered by the Mulhall charges to say, "Stop here; there is nothing in the Mulhall charges. On this subject wait until the witnesses have disappeared." But that is what this amendment means. The country is not so much interested in the Mulhall charges, not so much interested in the specific Members of Congress who have been named as it is interested to know whether congressional legislation is prevented or secured through the improper influence of one or a dozen associations in the country, or whether Members of Congress in the main act according to their best judgment as to what is right and what is wrong. I am not willing to have a committee of this House appointed with the proposition that it is throttled at the outset; that it is gagged before it is born; that when it finds something it must stop; that when it learns about something of value then it must quit until the opportunity has passed. Let us trust in the judgment of the committee, but give it power and hold it responsible for a thorough and complete investigation in order that the country may have not a report of a committee, which probably the country will not pay much attention to, but a report of the investigation as it proceeds which will be paid attention to by the people of the country.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I find myself unable to agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with whom I most always agree. I believe the amendment, or some amendment carrying that principle into this resolution, ought to be adopted. This resolution as it stands now authorizes an investigation in whatever may be wrong or alleged to be wrong in the demeanor or conduct of Members of this House and ex-Members of Congress 5 years, 10 years, 20 years, or even 50 years in the past.

I have to say that I have no objection to the scope or extent of the investigation, none whatever. If the committee appointed by the Speaker under this resolution completes all the work outlined in the resolution before it makes a report, the public may conclude that an effort is being made to conceal or hide from public view the conduct of some Members of Congress. The report, in that event, would be entirely too remote, too long-delayed. I do not believe this resolution means to conceal any fact, tie the hands of the committee, or to foreclose the powers of the committee and thus prevent a full investigation of the alleged improper influences exerted by the National Association of Manufacturers or by any other associations or persons, but, on the contrary, to command an immediate investigation and report, as speedily as it can be made, of every fact and act which it is charged, directly or by insinuation, affects the character, integrity, or rectitude of Members of Congress. And I believe this ought to be done. If the committee withholds its report until everything within the purview of this resolution has been investigated, I say to you that we will have another congressional election long before we get through, and gentlemen ought not to be obliged to go before their respective communities with this cloud hanging over them if they are innocent, and I believe most, if not all, of them are innocent. They will have to bear this stigma and be confronted in their district by men who are willing to repeat these slanders, without an acquittal at the hands of their colleagues, which they are entitled to if innocent. I believe, in justice to the Members of this House, in justice to distinguished gentlemen who are no longer Members—many of them from that side, too, Republicans, but for whom I entertain a high regard and in whose personal integrity I have an abiding faith—that we ought to insist upon an early report, a report to be made as soon as a searching investigation can be made.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I will.

Mr. MANN. It is now the 5th day of July, and no election for some time to come.

Mr. RUCKER. Less than a year.

Mr. MANN. Less than a year. Does not the gentleman believe that this committee appointed should go to work and be able to make a partial report at any time and a final report at the time Congress meets on the 1st of December, in any event?

Mr. RUCKER. I believe if the committee would go to work it could make a final report by the date suggested, but I am in favor of requiring it to act with reasonable promptness, as I believe the country demands to know if the accusations against Members are true or false. I am very much in sympathy with what has been said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. I doubt the propriety of so many investigations. It begins to look like the chief industry of this Congress is to investigate itself. There are too darned many of them. [Laughter.] I believe that if we would adjourn once in a while to attend somebody's funeral and thereby give congressional approval to the circumstances attending the death, it would be better than to have so many investigations. I do not mean a congressional funeral, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would not consent to the limitations put upon this committee by this amendment. It is no investigation at all. But to require the committee to report first, or as speedily as possible, upon the Mulhall charges, I would consent to an amendment of that kind, although I do not think it is necessary. I am willing to trust a committee of this House to perform its duty properly, but I will not handicap that committee before it is appointed by saying you can investigate right up to this place, where it states, and there stop. That is what this resolution does.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] knows that I would go quite as far as he would in untying the hands of this committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then do not restrict it.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not doing that. But, on the other hand, I will not stand with the gentleman to block a report and conceal publicity.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. There is not anybody that has the floor. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not entitled to make another speech on the amendment until everybody else has spoken who desires to speak.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] shall have one minute.

Mr. BRYAN. There is certainly no necessity of asking unanimous consent when nobody else wants to speak, according to the Speaker's ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must first find out. If nobody desires to speak, he will recognize the gentleman. Otherwise the gentleman from Washington can not speak again on the same amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has already spoken twice.

Mr. BRYAN. I simply desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. What is the correction that the gentleman wants to make?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Kansas made a suggestion——

The SPEAKER. What gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL, made a suggestion that my amendment was designed to stop the investigation, or that the effect of it was to stop the investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that, but under the rules the gentleman can not make another speech.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words and indorse everything that was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] about this restriction being placed on the committee. We have gone ahead and provided for a far-reaching investigation, and now to limit and to restrict it by the adoption of this amendment would be to do an unwise thing.

Let us assume that the Speaker of the House will appoint an able, courageous, wise commission that will take up this subject and begin the investigation and go into it and conduct it properly. We have the right to assume that the gentlemen who will be placed on this committee will know their duty and see to the performance of it at once.

I maintain that there ought not to be any restriction put upon them after we mark out the lines of their duty in the resolution providing for the inquiry. Therefore, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. BRYAN] and shall resist it, because I believe that this investigation should be a wide one; should be one without any limitation or restriction whenever we strike any set of circumstances that will throw light upon these charges and allegations that have been made in the public press. Therefore I oppose this amendment, and insist that we let this resolution stand in its full force and vigor, as we have amended it up to the present time. [Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] withdraws his pro forma amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], which has just been reported the second time.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee is also directed to inquire whether improper influence has been exerted by said association or by any other association, corporation, or person to secure the appointment or selection of the committees of the House, or any of them.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a committee amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize first the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "or" and insert a comma in lieu thereof, and insert after the word "selection" the following words, in line 20, page 2: "or defeat of Members."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if that amendment should be adopted, the paragraph would read as follows:

Said committee is also directed to inquire whether improper influence has been exerted by said association, or by any other association, corporation, or person, to secure the appointment, selection, or defeat of members of the committees of the House, or any of them.

The resolution as originally drawn simply applied to the election of Members and not to efforts to defeat any particular Member.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman intend to confine the effect of his amendment to the election or defeat of Members on committees or Members aspiring to appointment on committees?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. "Of members of the committees of the House, or any of them" is the way it reads.

Mr. MURDOCK. The aspirations of Members for appointment to committees—is that the idea?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The idea is to see what efforts have been made to defeat men as well as to secure their selection.

Mr. MURDOCK. In committee appointments?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know whether the language conveys that or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not see how it could be clearer. It reads:

Whether improper influence has been exerted by said association, or by any other association—

And so forth—

to secure the appointment, selection, or defeat of members of the committees of the House, or any of them.

Mr. MURDOCK. It seems to me, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, that the language that he has placed in there does not do the thing he intends to be done, which is to make an inquiry into the defeat or selection of Members who aspire to appointments on committees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman thinks that might apply to the selection or defeat of Members in their districts?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and not to appointments on committees.

Mr. RUCKER. Is it intended by this paragraph to confine this investigation to efforts to procure the selection or appointment or defeat of men to committee assignments in this particular Congress or in other Congresses?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is nothing which limits it. It says "of the House or any of them." I should say by the ordinary reasonable construction, taken in connection with the rest of the resolution, that it applies to any Congress.

Mr. RUCKER. Ordinarily referring to "committees of the House" means the committees of this House, not of the last Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But it does not say "of this House."

Mr. RUCKER. I think the proper construction should be that it has reference to this Congress or any other Congress, in view of the fact that the investigation is to be in reference to other matters and other Congresses.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think there will be no trouble about the construction of it.

Mr. RUCKER. I think there may be.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no objection to making it clear.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DECKER. Would it not carry out your intention better if you should say:

By any other association, corporation, or person to secure or prevent the appointment or selection of any Representative to any committee of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think that would be very good. If the gentleman will formulate that amendment I will be glad to accept it in lieu of the amendment which I offered. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] desires to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] desires to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman will state his amendment.

Mr. DECKER. In line 19, page 2, after the word "secure," insert the words "or prevent the appointment or selection of any Representative to any committee of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "secure," insert the words "or prevent the appointment or selection of any Representative to any committee of the House."

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, that is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. Is that correct?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I offer to amend the substitute by adding at the end of it the words "in this or any other Congress."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof the words "in this or any other Congress."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and then the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the amendment which I offered, and ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] be considered as the original amendment.

The SPEAKER. That makes it an amendment in the first degree.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page, 2, line 19, after the word "secure," insert the words "or prevent the appointment or selection of any Representative to any committee of the House."

Mr. RUCKER offered the following amendment to the amendment:

Add, after the word "House," the words "in this or any other Congress."

Mr. RUCKER. In this or any former Congress.

Mr. MANN. I should like to inquire whether it is any part of the amendment to strike out lines 20 and 21, or whether it is intended to leave them in, and to insert this amendment between lines 19 and 20.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Lines 20 and 21 ought to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] proposes to insert, without striking out anything.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It should be stricken out.

Mr. DECKER. I move to strike out lines 20 and 21, and insert in lieu thereof what has been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to strike out lines 20 and 21, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the matter just read.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from Tennessee a question. This last amendment is made to apply to the committees or Members of any prior House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Are the provisions from line 9 to line 16 on the same page not limited to this House, and ought they not, in express language, be made to apply to previous Houses just as this last paragraph was by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER]?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will say this to the gentleman. So far as I am concerned, I think the language offered by the gentleman from Missouri, Judge RUCKER, was really unnecessary. I think it applied without that language, and I think the paragraph to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has just referred does undoubtedly apply to past Congresses.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman notice the language in the preamble, and it, of course, will be used in construing the resolution—

For the purpose of improperly influencing legislation by Congress, the official conduct of certain of its Members and employees, the appointment and selection of committees of the House, and for other purposes—

And so forth. Would that apply exclusively to the present House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think not at all.

Mr. MANN. I call attention to the fact that the preamble could not refer to the present House, because the preamble refers to charges in the newspapers, and they specifically refer to prior Congresses.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The idea in the mind of the committee was that the preamble applied to past Congresses as well as the present.

Mr. COOPER. Having that understanding, then lines 9 to 16, which simply use the expression "the House of Representatives," would be construed as applicable to Members of any prior Houses.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee shall also inquire whether the said National Association of Manufacturers or any other organization or corporation or association or person does now maintain or has heretofore maintained a lobby for the purpose of influencing legislation by Congress and ascertain and report to what extent and in what manner, if at all, legislation has been improperly effected or prevented by reason of the existence of such lobby, if it be found to exist at all now or heretofore.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 3, line 1, after the word "Congress," insert:

And if so, the names of the persons composing such lobby.

Under the resolution as drawn here the committee is only authorized to ascertain whether or not a lobby has been in existence. I think it ought to be able to report the names of those who compose that lobby, if there has been one in existence.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I think that is provided for, anyway. If the committee finds there has been a lobby or is a lobby, of course it will include the facts indicating what the lobby is and of whom it is composed. I do not think it is necessary to insert that language.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the committee should find that there was a lobby consisting of all of the retail merchants in the United States of one particular kind or of all the dairymen in the United States, or of all of the wholesale men of one kind in the United States, would it be necessary to publish a list of all of those people?

Mr. HENRY. I would not think so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky that would be required.

Mr. BARKLEY. The object was not to include all men who may be interested in legislation, but only those who may be situated here in the Capital of the Nation who are ordinarily known as lobbyists.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand this resolution refers to maintaining a lobby in the Capital at Washington. That is not what it says. The lobby may be maintained at Baltimore or in New York or anywhere else throughout the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that is in broad general terms; but the object of this amendment is to report the names of persons composing the lobby who are stationed here for the purpose of influencing legislation.

Mr. MANN. I think that if some particular individual here were identified as a lobbyist, that fact would be reported, without any specific directions, but the committee may find that the National Association of Manufacturers and its members constitute a lobby, as they probably do.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "Congress," insert the words "and if so, the names of the persons composing such lobby."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest a change in the construction of the last clause in the paragraph, "if it be found to exist at all now or heretofore." The words "at all" are redundant. Of course, if it exists it exists at all, and the language "if it be found to exist heretofore" is unfortunate. I move as a substitute for that the following: "if it be found to exist now or to have existed heretofore."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, strike out the words "if it be found to exist at all now or heretofore" and insert in lieu thereof "if it be found to exist now or to have existed heretofore."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit in the city of Washington or elsewhere to conduct its investigations during the sessions of the House or recess of Congress. It shall have power to employ such legal or clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary, to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the words, in line 9, page 3, "such legal or." I think, in this case, the distinguished Speaker will appoint on the committee some prominent legal gentleman of this House who has ability to examine and cross-examine witnesses. I believe the members of the committee themselves ought to examine these witnesses. I do not believe in retaining legal counsel at great expense of from $15,000 to $25,000 or more, as it may cost. I am opposed to retaining any legal counsel. We have had enough of that in the past.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the gentleman from New York offering that amendment to strike out the provision authorizing this committee to employ counsel. In the first place, he is opposed to this resolution, and he has stated that the passage of this resolution would create a panic.

Mr. LEVY. No, no; no, sir.

Mr. HENRY. I think it is a stampede, not a panic.

Mr. LEVY. No, sir; I meant to say if you make a broad investigation, which I understood this resolution to be, to take in everything—money investigation and everything—it would create trouble as it did last year. Now, we have had the experience of last year in connection with the money investigation, and——

Mr. HENRY. How?

Mr. LEVY. In the money question. Mr. Untermyer acted as a district attorney. He was biased and did not ask the proper questions for that committee nor did he help them. If the members of that committee had done their duty and asked the witnesses the questions and cross-examined them, it would have been a great deal better than Mr. Untermyer.

Mr. HENRY. If my friend from New York had been endeavoring to assist the work of that committee——

Mr. LEVY. I did, sir.

Mr. HENRY (continuing). And not trying to impede the investigation——

Mr. LEVY. I was before your committee and said what we needed was remedial legislation, not investigation, and that is what we did need. That is the whole trouble. We should have given remedial legislation instead of an investigation. I said there was no Money Trust, but under our existing currency laws there was danger of one. The State of New York, its banks and bankers were so patriotic they never made use of the power they had. That is the trouble to-day—we want remedial legislation.

Mr. HENRY. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is no Money Trust?

Mr. LEVY. Yes, sir; I mean to say that there is no Money Trust. You never proved that there was a Money Trust. You have proved that under the law it was possible for a money trust to exist, but that power had never been exercised by the patriotic bankers of this country.

Mr. HENRY. In view of the information elicited I am surprised at the attitude of my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. LEVY. The matter was paraded before the country in a false light. New York came forward in the 1907 panic and stood by the whole country.

Mr. HENRY. What per cent of interest did they get?

Mr. LEVY. It was no question of interest; there was no money. New York paid out every dollar to the banks of the country——

Mr. HENRY. Where did they get the money?

Mr. LEVY. From bankers and the banks of New York City and the Nation. They came to the rescue, and that is what stayed the panic.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard a little further. I simply wanted to develop my friend's side of the case; that is all; and I allowed him to ask a question. I contend that after we have made this resolution broad enough to inaugurate an exhaustive investigation we ought to put every power and every legitimate influence at their command. We ought to give them an abundance of clerical assistance, and if they need legal assistance we ought to allow them to employ counsel. I have no counsel in mind. It would not make any difference to me what lawyers might be employed in this investigation, but I do know that the membership of this House, busy as it is with official duties and with questions of patronage and with the daily routine of its work here, these seven Members will not have the time to give this question all the attention that it requires.

For years and years we have been hearing of invisible government. We have been hearing of government by special interests, and all those things, and now when we have a direct charge here by two of the great newspapers of this country that a great association of manufacturers, that certain men, have combined themselves together to fix the committees of this House, to influence Representatives and Senators, to elect men to office, and to defeat them, I say we ought to put it in the power of this committee to employ one or two of the greatest lawyers of this country to take up the 20,000 telegrams and letters——

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Not for the present. I say that we ought to employ them to take up the 20,000 letters and telegrams and documents and papers, and study the case as a lawyer should study a great case, and prepare it for this committee in order that they may elicit the proper information. If there ever was a committee appointed by the Senate or the House where they need the authority, this is a case where it should occur. To me it is perfectly plain that we should go to the bottom of these transactions and let our investigation strike where it may. If it strikes anyone on the other side of the House or on this side, Democrat, Republican, or Bull Mooser, or those belonging to any other political party, let in the sunlight of publicity and let the American people know whether or not this invisible government has done these things.

Oh, it is all well enough to say that we have able lawyers that can be put on this committee. That is true. We have able lawyers in this House. They have their duties as Representatives, and what we ought to do is to authorize them to employ lawyers to study this case exhaustively and present the facts and follow up every lead as it occurs in order that the investigation may be what the American people demand it should be and have a right to expect of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] is opposed to this resolution. He was opposed to the Money Trust investigation and said——

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman allow me for a minute?

Mr. HENRY. I have not the time. He says that the counsel employed in that investigation accomplished no good. I am here to say to-day, and I measure my words when I say it, that the investigation of the Money Trust under the guidance of that great lawyer, Mr. Untermyer, of New York, has done more to uncover this invisible government and to establish that there is a Money Trust than anything that was ever done by any other proceeding, either in the House or in the Senate. It was one of the great investigations, and it will redound to the good of this and generations coming after us, and when we complete this work, if we do it under the guidance of the right sort of a lawyer, we will have accomplished another great thing for the American people.

Mr. COX and Mr. HAY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I can not remain idle and not speak my sentiments in behalf of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY]. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says he is not surprised at the gentleman from New York offering his amendment, because, he says, the gentleman from New York has been opposed to this resolution. I want to say here that no man in this House, I care not what his politics may be, is any more enthusiastic for this resolution than I am. I have been for it since I read in the press last Sunday evening the Mulhall exposure. But I can not and I will not remain idly by without defending the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY]. I do not care whether he is for or against the resolution. To me that is nothing. But in my judgment it is a stigma cast upon this House, when we plead guilty in this resolution—before the country—to the charge that we have not legal talent enough in this House to conduct this investigation and to explore it to the absolute bottom. [Applause.]

I am unalterably opposed to the reckless, heedless, wild, extravagant expenditure of the people's money for such a purpose, when we ought to assume that burden ourselves and bear it upon our own shoulders. Why, who has forgotten the debate upon the floor of this House when the Money Trust investigating committee made its report and the criticisms upon Mr. Untermyer for assuming entire jurisdiction of that committee?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In that case there was a limitation of the cost in the resolution originally passed. Subsequently they asked for $25,000 or $30,000 more, and it was granted, and there was a great deal of criticism in consequence. In this resolution there is no limitation of cost?

Mr. COX. None in the world.

I was not a member of the committee that investigated that trust, but if I had been I would absolutely have refused to be bound by the questions of Mr. Untermyer. As a Representative in Congress owing a duty to my constituency, I deny the right of any committee to employ lawyers and counsel to come in and conduct that investigation in its absolute entirety.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. DIES. Speaking of the Money Trust and the fifteen-odd thousand dollars paid to our Hebrew brother, Mr. Untermyer, by the parties engaged in conducting that investigation, I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does he now know anything more about the Money Trust than he knew and everybody else knew before that investigation?

Mr. COX. Not as the result of the brain power of Mr. Untermyer; no. If I were appointed a member of this investigating committee I would not vote for lawyers to supervise the questions to be propounded to these lobbyists. I would refuse to let them censor my questions, and I believe that any man whom the Speaker of this House will appoint upon that committee will feel the same way. I am in favor of appointing seven Members of this House, and I care not whom the Speaker appoints. I know he will appoint men of ability and throw the responsibility upon them, and then we will have a full and complete investigation.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. COX. I have not the time now.

Here is what you would have if you hire lawyers—you might have this condition brought upon you: The members of that committee will feel that their power is superseded by some lawyer. They will undertake to cast about and throw the responsibility upon some hired attorney, who is to get $25,000 or $30,000, or perhaps $50,000 before the investigation closes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. Does not the gentleman understand that this only leaves it to the discretion of the committee to employ counsel if they deem it necessary?

Mr. COX. I understand that thoroughly; but I refuse to leave it to the discretion of the committee. First let the Speaker appoint his committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the merits of this amendment can be obscured by attacking the attitude of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] as to this resolution in its entirety.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one minute?

Mr. SMALL. Not now. I am in favor of the amendment. There is no ground upon which the employment of an attorney to assist committees can be justified as existing in this case. There is no expert legal knowledge required. There is no such degree of labor or investigation as ought to be put upon an attorney; no labor which can not well be undertaken by members of the committee themselves.

Besides that, Mr. Speaker, if there was ever a committee in which it was inappropriate to authorize the employment of an attorney, it is this committee.

This committee is authorized to investigate charges which affect the integrity of the House; and to say to the country that such a committee must have the assistance of an outsider, an attorney, in order to prepare the committee to investigate the questions and the charges affecting the integrity of its membership, and of the body as a whole, is a reflection upon the House and upon the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is not the slightest justification for this resolution to carry with it the authority or the option upon the part of the committee to employ any legal assistance. Mention was made of the thousands of documents that would be submitted, all of which would be required to be analyzed. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is provided for. No Member of the House will object to the committee having ample clerical assistance, such assistance as can assemble and analyze any volume of testimony or record evidence which may be submitted to the committee, so as to avoid imposing upon the committee any undue burden of that character. I am surprised that the Committee on Rules, in bringing in this resolution, should have considered for a moment that a committee of this character, to inquire into the integrity of the House, should even be authorized to employ counsel to assist it in the performance of its delicate, important, and responsible duties.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. The inquiry is not so much to exonerate Members who are charged. The Members can exonerate themselves in 30 minutes when this committee is convened for action. That is not the side of the question I am looking at. I know these gentlemen will clear themselves very speedily. It does not take any lawyer to do that, but there is the other great question over and beyond that—the question of this invisible government, of these men who have tried for the last 20 or 25 years to dominate the affairs of legislation. That is what we want ventilated, and I want this committee to get back of that. I have no fears about how the Members will come out of this matter. They can defend themselves. There is no question of reflection on them, but it is a question of getting into a broader field and ascertaining the activities of this great National Association of Manufacturers and other special interests that have been governing this country. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. I did not yield for a speech, Mr. Speaker. The argument for the authorization or employment of counsel in this case can not be justified by speaking of an invisible government, a power which dominates or influences the action of this House. This committee are not authorized to investigate any invisible government, except in so far as it assumes tangible form and shape and attempts to influence by improper methods, motives, and purposes the official action of this House in matters which have heretofore come before it. That is the question, and not the question of any invisible government.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule, is debate on this amendment exhausted?

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is.

Mr. MANN. Then let us have a vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, strike out the words "legal or."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I can hardly agree with the argument advanced against it by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] seems to assume that unless counsel is employed we will not get at the facts. In other words, he charges that facts would be smothered unless we employed an attorney. He said he wanted the light of day thrown upon all these questions to be investigated by this committee. I do not know any people to whom I would rather trust the great task of examining into these questions than seven Members of this House. [Applause.] Who is most interested in bringing these things to light? Who is most interested in having the light of day thrown upon all these charges which have been made against the membership of this House? It is the membership of this House; and the agents appointed by the Speaker of this House will be the men who above all others will be in favor of throwing the light of day upon all of these different questions.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want an attorney to tell us how to conduct this investigation. If it is true that this investigation should be turned over to an attorney, why not let the Speaker of this House appoint an attorney or attorneys, and let them do it, and let us be their witnesses, or whatever else they choose to call upon us for?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will for a question.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman does not understand that I said this committee would turn the investigation over to an attorney, does he?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. HENRY. I only said that the attorney would be under the direction of the committee and would aid in this investigation under the direction of this committee.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman insisted, or rather said, that in order that the facts might not be smothered, it was necessary to employ an attorney.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; smothered by some witnesses evading process of the committee, where the committee could not follow them up.

Mr. HAY. Has the gentleman so low an opinion of the legal ability of this House that he does not think it is equal to the cross-examination of any witness who might appear before this committee?

Mr. HENRY. That is not the question. If the gentleman were on this committee, would he feel that he had all of the time to devote to it——

Mr. HAY. Yes; I would. If I were on this committee, which I sincerely trust will not be the case, I would feel that it was my duty to devote all of my time, all of my energy, all of my brains to giving to the work of this committee the utmost diligence that I could.

Mr. HENRY. I certainly hope the Speaker will put the gentleman upon the committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe that if we want a speedy investigation that goes to the bottom of the matter, we not only better not have an attorney employed, but better keep the attorneys off the committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. No; I do not believe that. I believe it will be very much better for a speedy investigation not to employ an attorney, but I believe that there ought to be lawyers here on the committee—not all lawyers, but some lawyers.

Mr. MANN. But if they were not on the committee at all, we would learn more in quicker time.

Mr. HAY. That may be the gentleman's opinion, but it is not mine. For the reasons I have given I do not believe it is necessary, and I do not believe it will be right to employ an attorney in an investigation of this character.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. This impresses me as did another case; and I do not, of course, mean this in reference to my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY], but unwittingly we are trying to do for some lawyer what David Lamar, of recent fame, was trying to do for another lawyer in New York—get him a job. [Laughter.] I just want to drop this for the benefit of my colleague and for the benefit of this House: If there is a man, a Member of Congress, who knows any more about the Money Trust now than he did before we paid Mr. Untermyer his $15,000, I want him to hold up his hand and tell me what he has learned since then. We knew then what our national banking laws were. We knew then all about the gambling on the stock exchange. My colleague talks about the "invisible" government that controls and holds in its hand the destiny of this Republic. I deny that. I stand before one branch of the visible Government of this Republic, and there is not a man here who knows better than my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that there is no "invisible" government in this Republic, unless, indeed, our constituents at home, of whom we are dreadfully afraid, are the "invisible" government. To leave the impression upon this country, to leave the impression among the ignorant and the uninitiated that there is some "invisible," satanic government here that is shaping legislation and controlling us is almost diabolical in its effect on the integrity of our institutions.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. With pleasure.

Mr. HENRY. According to the argument of my colleague from Texas, we do not want any investigation at all.

Mr. DIES. Oh, well, we have 433 Members of Congress, and you are going to give them a whitewash by a committee of seven. It reminds me of what John Randolph, of Roanoke, said one time when they had a horse race in Virginia. They could not get a stakeholder. Some fellow popped up and said: "I will hold your money." "Yes," said Randolph, "but who will hold you?" [Laughter.] If the American people will not believe in the integrity and the honesty of 433 of their Representatives, will they believe in the verdict of seven or nine of their number that you get to try them? Talk about hiring lawyers to come here to develop the honesty or patriotism of Members of Congress! It will turn out like the Money Trust investigation, which was not worth a penny and which cost the Government almost a quarter of a million dollars. You do not know anything now about the Money Trust that was not known before. We knew then and we know now that the people are paying interest on the bonds and paying interest on the notes issued by the banks.

The President of the United States is making a patriotic effort to give the country a stable, Government-controlled currency, and I am with him in the effort. Instead of running around here like scared rats in a barn talking about lobbies that do not exist and lobbyists that do not exist, let us pass a currency bill and go home. We have already revised the tariff downwards, thank God, and I helped to do it, and I am going to help the President and the Congress give the people currency legislation, and all this talk about hiring lawyers and have them investigate Congress is bunk of the purest variety. Let me tell you something. The people believe we are honest now——

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DIES. With unspeakable pleasure.

Mr. COOPER. Thank you kindly. If I understand the gentleman's position here, the House of Representatives, being investigated, ought to ask the questions. In other words, being investigated, it ought to interrogate witnesses. Is that it?

Mr. DIES. If I thought we needed investigation, which I do not——

Mr. COOPER. We are going to pass the resolution.

Mr. DIES. Conscious of my own rectitude and firm in the faith that you are as honest as I am, and that no lobby is going to influence either you or me in passing legislation, I think it is the merest act of cowardice for this House to hire lawyers and appoint committees to engage in an investigation at this time, the only effect of which will be to spend a few thousand dollars and waste a lot of time. If there has been wrongdoing by Members of Congress, let us punish, not hold hearings; impeachment is your remedy, not a long-winded investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 32.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to delay the House I shall make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HENRY. How is that?

Mr. MANN. Tellers will not change the result. It takes too long and some of us want to get away.

Mr. HENRY. I do not think any gentleman would make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. I say it is too late in the afternoon on Saturday afternoon. Some of us want to leave town.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact, while I believe that the House should leave this part of the resolution as it was, I withdraw my demand for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his demand for tellers. On this question the ayes are 86, the noes are 32, and the amendment of the gentleman from New York is adopted.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 12, by adding the following to the paragraph: "This committee shall conclude its investigations and submit a final report on or before the 1st day of September, 1913."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, this amendment simply requires the committee to conclude this investigation and submit its final report by the 1st day of September, 1913. It seems to me that a limit should be placed upon the period within which this committee may continue its investigation and submit its final report, and I have selected September 1 as being a date probably before the adjournment of the present session of Congress. That will give the committee substantially two months, July and August, within which to pursue its investigations, an ample time within which to formulate their report after the actual investigation has been concluded. That, it seems to me, is a wise limitation upon the committee, both upon the score of expense and for the additional reason that an inquiry of this kind, involving the integrity of the membership of this House and of the House as a whole, should be conducted as speedily and concluded as quickly as it may be with dignity and with proper discharge of the duties devolving upon such committee.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. I did not catch the amendment as it was reported, my attention being distracted at the time. Does the gentleman propose to limit this committee to a report on the 1st day of September on everything?

Mr. SMALL. On everything.

Mr. HENRY. I will say to the gentleman very candidly that if he shall insist upon that, I will make the point of no quorum before I will let that amendment go through. I give the gentleman that notice now. This investigation is too large and too important to put such a limit on it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I am going to insist on my amendment, and it is for the House to decide. Unless it can be shown that more time is required for the investigation and the deliberations of this committee than practically 60 days——

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. It has been frequently stated this afternoon that it is possible that the Senate, having possession of the important papers in this case, might hold them for a month or six weeks, during which there would be no hope of the House coming into possession of them. Suppose these papers might be delayed in the hands of the Senate committee for that length of time, or for months for that matter? I hope the gentleman will change that amendment.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, that is merely speculative. I have heard the same statement, but I can not believe, and I do not believe, that a committee of the Senate would refuse to deliver to a committee of the House, after it shall have been constituted, all such record evidence as they may have affecting the integrity of the membership of the House, and I can not believe that the Senate committee would be guilty of such a discourtesy and thereby delay the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that the gentleman from North Carolina has introduced that amendment. At first the gentleman is in favor of striking out the provision allowing this committee to employ counsel. Now, he comes along, after the striking out of the provision authorizing the committee to employ counsel, and wants to put a limit of less than four weeks on this committee to investigate and make a report on this great question. What is there to hide? Why not let it have publicity? What fear has the gentleman that this committee can profitably put in three or four or six months in order to get to the bottom of these nefarious charges?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make a point of no quorum at a quarter to 4 o'clock.

Mr. HENRY. I will finish long before that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Mr. Speaker, it would not distress me if the gentleman did make the point of no quorum, because this investigation does not and can not affect me one way or the other. If you begin it on Monday I shall be satisfied. If you do not begin it at all it will not worry me, except for the integrity of the House.

Mr. MANN. Let us vote.

Mr. HENRY. But I wanted to call to the attention of the membership of the House that after striking out the provision for counsel there is a sentiment and an effort to put a limit on the time this committee is to sit and make an investigation. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, line 6, page 3, by striking out the words "or any subcommittee thereof."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, strike out the words "or any subcommittee thereof."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, one moment. I move that amendment because, in my judgment, seven men is a number sufficiently small to consider a thing of this vast importance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him just to suggest one thing?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have an idea that the only time there would be a subcommittee appointed would be, based on experience I have had with a committee similar to this, in cases where perchance there might be a sick witness or something of that sort away from where the committee was sitting, and where it would be economy to send two members of the committee to take the testimony.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I think that consideration does not weigh against the importance of having all the seven men who are on this committee see every witness who testifies. One of our constitutional provisions is that a man being tried for an offense shall be entitled to be confronted by the witnesses against him. I want the judges of this case, this committee, to see every man and every woman, and see what they look like, notice their manner, and determine whether they are telling the truth or not.

I do not want a committee of seven to appoint a subcommittee of two to go out and take the testimony of a witness and then have the other five know nothing whatever of what was said in the deposition. That never amounts to anything, as any lawyer knows, in the trial of an important lawsuit.

That ought to be stricken out, and there ought also to be an amendment to the effect that every meeting of the committee should be open to the public. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting after the word "Congress," in line 9, page 3, the following: "All meetings of said committee or of any subcommittee, excepting only executive meetings, shall be open to the public."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest objection to that amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Neither have I.

Mr. MURDOCK. One moment, Mr. Speaker. What does the gentleman mean when he proposes to provide that all meetings shall be open to the public except executive meetings?

Mr. COOPER. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think any committee should have any secret meetings at all. I think that every meeting of a committee, executive and otherwise, should be public. But as a matter of fact it is only by drawing this amendment in this way that it stands any chance of being adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK. As a matter of fact can not the committee hold all its meetings in secret?

Mr. COOPER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the word "executive" has come to mean "secret," so that the gentleman's amendment means simply that all meetings of the committee, except secret meetings, shall be open to the public.

Mr. COOPER. I know, of course, that whenever the gentleman from Illinois has an opportunity to make a comment of that kind that would be his comment. But I have never known an executive meeting of a committee to be anything but a meeting where you did not take the testimony of the witnesses. An executive meeting, I have always understood, is where a committee decides what it will do, making up its mind upon facts presented to it. But if that interpretation is now put upon it—and it has been put into the record by the gentleman from Illinois—it is an interpretation that I have not heard before upon other committees, because in the Committee on Foreign Affairs when men come we say, "We are about to have an executive meeting," and everybody goes out except the members of the committee.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not strike that word out?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "executive" and say "all meetings for the hearing of witnesses or the taking of testimony by any committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] as modified.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman may have time in which to correct the language of his amendment, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will not the gentleman wait a second? I want to rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point for a little while.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-seven Members are present—not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until Wednesday, July 9, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 18, memorializing the Congress of the United States for favorable consideration of the request of the Legislature of the State of California for investigations and surveys by the California Débris Commission under the provisions of an act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, to aid in the preparation and making a report on a project for the relief from floods in the San Joaquin Valley and the delta of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers and for improvements in aid of commerce and navigation.

Whereas conditions injuriously affecting vast areas of valuable land adjacent to, and the interests of commerce and navigation in, the river systems of the San Joaquin Valley, within the power of the California Débris Commission to correct under the provisions of an act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, creating said commission and defining its duties, are identical with those existing in the river systems of the Sacramento Valley and require like remedial treatment; and

Whereas the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers form a delta common to both, and by connecting waterways their flood waters mingle, frequently involving great damage to property and to navigation; and

Whereas the work involved and plans contemplated in said rivers and said delta under the requirements of said act should be coordinated into one harmonious project; and

Whereas the report of said commission made in accordance with the requirements of said act, including maps and containing a project, together with estimate of the cost thereof, for the relief from floods in the Sacramento Valley, transmitted to the Congress of the United States by the Secretary of War June 25, 1911, and approved and recommended by him for adoption by Congress, now designated as House Document No. 81, Sixty-second Congress, first session, with such modifications therein as have since said last-named date been made and approved, applies only to the Sacramento River conditions, and said commission strongly urges "that work begin at once and provision be made for its early completion"; and

Whereas as delay in treating these conditions in the river systems of the Sacramento Valley has greatly added to the injury done as well as to the cost of the proposed project, the same results will follow delay in treating like conditions in the river systems of the San Joaquin Valley; and

Whereas as investigations and surveys are required preliminary to the making of a report by said commission on said river systems in the San Joaquin Valley, it is of the utmost importance that such investigations and surveys be commenced without unnecessary delay; and

Whereas as said remedial work necessary in said river systems and said delta make the problem a vital one pressing for an early solution, the Legislature of the State of California has by appropriate legislation adopted the project contained in said report, has appropriated funds therefor, and has in other ways indicated its willingness to cooperate with the United States in furtherance of this great work: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California in regular session assembled memorializes the Congress of the United States for such legislation and direction as will provide for such investigations and surveys by the California Débris Commission under the provisions of said act, thereby hastening the preparation and making of the report on a project for the relief from floods in the San Joaquin Valley and said delta and for improvements in aid of commerce and navigation; be it further

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all honorable means to secure favorable consideration of this memorial; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this memorial be transmitted by the governor of the State of California to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers United States Army, the California Débris Commission, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 19, memoralizing the Congress of the United States for favorable consideration of the project contained in the report of the California Débris Commission relating to "control of floods in the river systems of the Sacramento Valley and the adjacent San Joaquin Valley, Cal."

Whereas the Secretary of War on the 29th day of June, 1911, submitted to the House of Representatives of the United States, duly approved and recommended for adoption, the report of the California Débris Commission relating to "control of floods in the river systems of the Sacramento Valley and the adjacent San Joaquin Valley, Cal.," now known and designated as House Document No. 81, Sixty-second Congress, first session; and

Whereas the approval of said report contains the suggestion "that work begin at once and provision be made for its early completion"; and

Whereas the construction and completion of the project proposed in said report is of vital importance to the people of this State and of the whole country; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of California, in extraordinary session assembled, did by an act of said legislature adopt the project and recommendations set forth in said report of the California Débris Commission, and appropriate funds therefor, and has also in said act provided for cooperation between the State of California and the Government of the United States in putting into effect the proposed project and recommendations: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the said legislature memorializes the Congress of the United States for favorable consideration of the report of said California Débris Commission, transmitted as aforesaid by the Secretary of War to Congress, together with all modifications thereof as approved by the said commission, the Secretary of War, and Chief of Engineers, and also for early action on appropriations to carry out the recommendations of said report and said project; be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of War, Chief of Engineers, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress; be it further

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested to use all honorable means to secure favorable action on said report and said project.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 23, relative to the establishment of a Government-owned line of steamships to operate between Pacific and Atlantic ports.

Whereas the shippers of the Pacific coast were for many years at the mercy of the transcontinental railroads in the matter of rates charged upon shipments to and from the Atlantic seaboard and Eastern States; and

Whereas these transcontinental railroads have attempted and now are attempting to secure an absolute monopoly of transportation facilities by destroying independent water competition via the Isthmus of Panama and by controlling existing lines of steamships; and

Whereas this monopoly is now threatening to become absolute through the destruction of the California-Atlantic Steamship Co., which was controlled by Henry Sears Bates and Arthur Sewall Chesebrough, worthy descendants of illustrious California pioneers; and

Whereas the experience of the California-Atlantic Transportation Co. has demonstrated the impossibility of a successful fight by individuals for an independent steamship line because of the sinister and powerful influences controlling the transcontinental railroads and steamship lines now operating; and

Whereas it is vital to the commercial life of the Pacific coast and to the Nation as a whole that competition be maintained against the transcontinental railroads and their steamship lines and that that competition be strong enough to withstand the ruthless tactics of organized wealth; and

Whereas the construction of the great Panama Canal will be a menace instead of a benefit to the people of the United States if the transcontinental railroads are allowed to maintain a monopoly of water competition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly express their approval of a Government owned and operated line of steamships to operate between Pacific and Atlantic ports via Panama; and be it further

Resolved, That the senate and assembly jointly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use every possible and honorable influence toward the establishment of such a line.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 27, relative to the purchase by the United States of the Tioga Road.

Whereas the State of California has by legislation and appropriations therefor established, constructed, and maintained a system of State highways, among which is a highway from Lake Tahoe to Placerville, a distance of 62 miles, and a highway from Bridgeport, in Mono County, to Long Barn, in Tuolumne County, a distance of 78 miles, and known as the Sonora and Mono Road, and is now constructing a highway from said Lake Tahoe Road to a point known as the junction on said Sonora and Mono Roads, a distance of 81 miles, and has constructed a highway from the east end of the Tioga Road to a point near Mono Lake and known as the Mono Lake Basin Road, a distance of 9 miles, and there is now pending in this session of the legislature a bill for the construction of a State highway from Bridgeport to Independence, a distance of 150 miles, connecting with said Mono Lake Basin Road, all of which roads are opened to travel of all kind thereover; and

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill to purchase by the United States said Tioga Road from its owners and to maintain the same by said Government as a free public road for travel thereover, and which bill has been favorably acted upon by the committees in Congress to which it had been referred; and

Whereas said Tioga Road connects at Crockers with the Big Oak Flat Road, and if the purchase of said Tioga Road be completed and said road be maintained as a free public highway for travel it makes a complete highway system from Sacramento to Lake Tahoe, thence over the Alpine highways to Tioga, Yosemite Valley, and San Francisco, traversing the Sierra Navada Mountains amid nature's most beautiful scenery: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That we request our Senators and Congressmen to use all honorable means to secure the early passage of said bill providing for the purchase of said Tioga Road and an adequate appropriation to place and maintain the same in good condition to provide for free travel for all kinds of vehicles thereover; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be directed to send a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 35, relative to acquisition of title under homestead law.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Fortieth Session of the Legislature of California and the Assembly jointly:

Whereas sections 2291 and 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, regulating the acquisition of title to public lands under the homestead law, were amended by act of Congress dated June 6, 1912 (37 Stats., 123); and

Whereas the law now requires the cultivation of at least one-sixteenth of the land entered before the expiration of two years from the date of entry, and the cultivation of at least one-eighth thereof before the expiration of three years from the date of entry and thereafter until the submission of final proof; and

Whereas there is no provision for the grazing of stock in lieu of cultivation on lands chiefly valuable for pasturage purposes; and

Whereas practically all the vacant lands within the Sacramento land district in the State of California are valuable only for grazing purposes and are not susceptible of cultivation; and

Whereas the aforesaid vacant lands should be utilized under the homestead laws by those persons who have made or are entitled to make homestead entries;

Now, therefore, in view of the foregoing, we respectfully memorialize our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means in securing the enactment of such statute as will better adapt the homestead law to the character of the land still subject to entry and relieve many entrymen who made their filings under the law as amended, under a misapprehension as to the requirements thereof, thereby promoting the settlement and development of the vast area of public land subject to entry if grazing of live stock be accepted in lieu of cultivation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted by telegraph to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 40, relative to setting apart a district of land in Butte County, State of California, as a national park and memorializing the Congress of the United States to create such national park.

Whereas there has been discovered in Butte County, State of California, a region of great waterfalls, imposing precipices, and mammoth trees, including the famous Fall River Falls, Bald Rock Canyon, and other points of interest; and

Whereas one of these waterfalls alone has a drop of 500 feet and others are of almost equal grandeur, thus entitling them to a place among the world's great falls; and

Whereas, owing to the marvelous beauty of this whole region, a movement has been started to set this district apart for the people of the United States as a new wonderland and playground; and

Whereas the territory, situated on the middle fork of the Feather River, included in the 6 square miles thus desired to be set apart, is now Government land: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to act favorably upon a certain petition numerously signed by citizens of the State of California and of the United States asking that the district hereinbefore described be set apart and established as a national park; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use all honorable means necessary and appropriate to secure the enactment of the necessary legislation therefor; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a certified copy of these resolutions to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 30, relative to memorializing the Congress of the United States to initiate proceedings therein for the preparation of and submission to the several States of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States placing women and men on an equality with respect to citizenship and the exercise of the elective franchise.

Whereas the right to equal privileges in the exercise of the elective franchise by women is fast being acknowledged by the people and accorded by the several States of the American Union: and

Whereas the exercise of this privilege should not be restricted to States but should be as complete as that enjoyed by men: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States to initiate proceedings therein for the preparation of and submission to the several States of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States placing women and men on an equality with respect to citizenship and the exercise of the elective franchise; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives in Congress requested to use all honorable means to secure the object of this memorial; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit duly authenticated copies of this memorial to the President of the United States, the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SENATE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, June 30, 1913.

To United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Respectfully, yours, W. N. PARRISH, Secretary.

Senate joint resolution 34, relative to the amendment of the postal law of the United States to permit inspection and subsequent treatment or destruction of nursery stock, shrubbery, ornamental plants, and fruits upon arrival in the State to which it is consigned through the parcel post.

Whereas the present statutes of the United States prohibit any postmaster from delaying the delivery of any package or parcel or to open or inspect the same; and

Whereas the new parcel post law is bringing into the several States nursery stock, shrubbery, ornamental plants, fruits, etc., in great quantities; and

Whereas our inspection officers are finding on some of these shipments serious insect and fungoid pests not yet in our State, which if introduced would do us incalculable damage; and

Whereas Order 6696 of the United States Postmaster General states that any postmaster "may," if requested, inform the horticultural officer of any parcel of plants, trees, or fruits received at his office and to whom delivered; and

Whereas it is impossible to search out all of said importations for purpose of inspection; and

Whereas it is imperative for the safety of the great fruit interests that there be thorough and universal inspection of all trees, plants, and fruits received through the mails at the points of delivery; and

Whereas this under the present law is entirely impossible: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of California and the Assembly jointly, That Congress be, and hereby is, requested to take immediate and necessary measures permitting and requiring the Postmaster General of the United States to order all nursery stock, shrubbery, ornamental plants, fruits, etc., sent through the mails to be forwarded to certain conveniently located points where they may be inspected, and if found free from injurious pests or diseases to be repacked and remailed to the consignee, and if infected to be treated and remailed or destroyed; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all honorable means to secure the action desired in this matter for the purpose aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of Agriculture, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a resolution adopted by the Commonwealth Club of California, favoring an appropriation providing for a diversion of the waters of the Hetch Hetchy Valley for reservoir purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRADLEY. I present a letter in the nature of a memorial from the superintendent of the Board of Trade of Louisville, Ky., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
Louisville, Ky., June 27, 1913.

Hon. W. O. BRADLEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The directors of the Louisville Board of Trade at their meeting on June 25 adopted a resolution by a unanimous vote protesting against the passage by Congress of that portion of the general revenue bill now pending in the Senate which is placed under subsection E of income-tax section, which requires a tenant paying a rental of $4,000 or more annually to withhold out of his payments to his landlord each year a sum sufficient to pay the normal taxes of 1 per cent imposed upon such sum by the income-tax law, and I was directed to lay this protest before the Senators and Representatives from Kentucky, and respectfully, but very earnestly, request them to oppose the passage of said section.

The only condition upon which a lessee may withhold from his lessor less than 1 per cent of the rental is that the lessor shall render to the lessee an affidavit to the effect that deductions from such annual rental on account of necessary expense of maintenance, such as taxes, insurance, and repairs, etc., bring the amount of the income received by the lessor from such tenant from all other sources to a sum less than $4,000. Such affidavit filed by such lessor with such lessee must contain a statement of the deductions asked for on account of taxes, insurance, repairs, etc., and must also contain a statement of the lessor's annual account, profits, and income from all other sources.

The directors do not by any means oppose a Federal income-tax law, but they believe that this provision referred to is unnecessary, and incidents and requirements pertaining to it would be inquisitorial and unfair. They believe that if a landlord or other person is compelled to expose his private business and affairs to any person it should be only to a Government official and not to private person.

I am directed to respectfully ask your attention to this provision of the proposed law and to request that you will object and oppose its passage.

By order of the board of directors.

LOUISVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
By JAMES F. BUCKNER, Jr., Secretary.

A letter from B. T. Galloway, Acting Secretary of Agriculture, which was to form a part of the report, was omitted, and therefore I ask for a reprint of the report (No. 62).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and there will be a reprint of the report.

REPORTS ON COURTS AND JUDGES.

Mr. WORKS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 126), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is openly and publicly charged that the Department of Justice has established and is maintaining a system of investigation and espionage over the courts and judges of the country and that spies, inspectors, or agents of some kind are appointed and sent out by said department to secretly spy upon, investigate, and report on the conduct of such courts and judges: Now therefore

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to inform the Senate what inspectors or other agents are appointed by him or his department to investigate and report upon the conduct or proceedings of any of the courts or judges of the country, their names, the duties performed by them and each of them, under what law they are appointed, what instructions are given them, any rules and regulations under which they act, what courts and judges have been under investigation within the past five years by appointed agents, assistants, or otherwise, and the reports made by such inspectors or others bearing upon the proceedings or conduct of any and all such courts and judges, and what action the Attorney General or the Department of Justice has taken in each case on such reports.

NOTES ON TARIFF REVISION, 1913 (S. DOC. NO. 122).

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document Notes on the Revision of the Tariff of 1913, compiled by Thomas J. Doherty, Esq.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE LANDSCHAFTEN SYSTEM OF RURAL CREDITS (S. DOC. NO. 123).

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a paper which I have just received from Hon. David Lubin, American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, in which the writer discusses some of the important subjects that are now being investigated by the United States commission in European countries generally dealing with the question of rural credit and cooperation in agricultural matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

PROTECTION OF BIRDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Senate resolution 25, submitted by Mr. MCLEAN April 7, 1913, and reported April 12, 1913, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with amendments by Mr. ROOT, was announced as the first business on the calendar, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to propose to the Governments of other countries the negotiation of a convention for the mutual protection and preservation of birds.

The first amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in line 3, before the word "protection," to strike out the word "mutual."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 4, before the word "birds," to insert the word "migratory."

Mr. ROOT. I think the amendment introducing the word "migratory" in the resolution is unnecessary, and I will ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JACOB M. COOPER.

The bill (S. 754) for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Jacob M. Cooper, now a resident of Iowa, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company C, Twenty-second Regiment United States Infantry, July 18, 1868; but no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BACON. I ask if there is a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a report.

Mr. BACON. If it is a long one, I shall not ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report consists of two pages.

Mr. BACON. I will not ask to have it read under those circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. Unless there is something very special desired by a Senator, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will not make the motion, however, if a Senator has a special interest in any matter which is now available.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

VALORIZATION OF COFFEE.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to give notice that on Thursday, July 10, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate in response to the reply of the Attorney General to Senate resolution 95, relating to the valorization of coffee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, July 10, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 9, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We stand before Thee, O God our heavenly Father, with bowed heads and open hearts. We can not hide ourselves from Thee, we can not cover our hearts, and we would not if we could. We need Thy corrective and guiding hand. Punish us, we beseech Thee, when we go wrong; encourage us when we go right, that we may be faithful servants and fulfill our destiny upon the earth, and be prepared for whatever Thou hast for us in the great beyond. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 5, 1913, was read and approved.

FUTURES IN COTTON.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a communication from W. B. Thompson, former president of the New Orleans Exchange, to Hon. C. S. Barrett, president of the National Farmers' Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, July 2, 1913.

Hon. C. S. BARRETT,
President National Farmers' Union, Union City, Ga.:

The Clarke amendment to the tariff bill will not regulate future trading, but by destroying the future-contract markets will strike down all future trading, both good and bad. Hedges can not be bought or sold, hence the spot-cotton business will be made speculative in the last degree. This will mean that the multitude of cotton buyers of small or limited means will be forced out of business and the producer will be under the necessity of carrying his cotton indefinitely or else selling it at the price offered by spinners or by a few large operators, or a combination of the same, whose business it will be to speculate upon the producer's necessities.

Furthermore, the provision in the amendment limiting the tax and penalty to future contracts made on or under the rules of any cotton exchange or similar institution will not only destroy the contract exchanges of New Orleans and New York, but will destroy all the local exchanges throughout the cotton belt, because no man will hold membership in an institution when such fact subjects his private contracts to an excessive tax and renders him liable to a penalty from $1,000 to $20,000 for conducting his business in accordance with the rules and regulations established by such exchanges for the protection and benefit of the trade. If all these exchanges were put out of business there would be no points for the collection and dissemination of information as to conditions, and the producer would be wholly in the dark as to the value of his cotton and would be at the mercy of the buyer, whose superior private facilities put him into possession of such information.

Moreover, if there were no exchanges or similar organizations there could be no rules or standards of trade regulating and restraining individual conduct in business, which would result in disorderly conditions most prejudicial to all concerned. In other words, the said tax amendment would not only destroy the future markets of America, but would disorganize the whole system by which our crops are moved and place us in the hands of foreign organizations and local combinations of buyers.

It is reported that in supporting said amendment some Senators take the position that while they doubt the wisdom of the measure, or are of the positive opinion that it is unwise and will be injurious, still, as the farmers want it, they say, let them have it and take the consequences. We can not afford to experiment with such a vital matter. I am not connected with any exchange in an official capacity, and I have no interest in any future business. You know that I have given much time and effort to the betterment of the producer's condition and to improvement in all legitimate trade. I think you believe in the sincerity of my purpose. I say to you earnestly that, in my opinion, this measure is fraught with the most serious consequences to the interests you represent; and with no intention of being officious, but animated only by a sincere desire to cooperate with you in your work for the southern farmer, I beg you to give this vital matter your most serious consideration before using the power of your great organization to advance so dangerous a measure and before you accept responsibility therefor.

W. B. THOMPSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 754) for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 4.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Zachariah Chandler, presented by the State of Michigan to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the purity of his life and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Michigan.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 754. An act for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 98. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for the use of the Confederate Veterans' Reunion, to be held at Brunswick, Ga., in July, 1913.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. LEVER, for four days.

To Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. At the last session of the House a privileged matter was pending, and while it was pending the point of no quorum was made. Now, does an intervening adjournment do away with that proceeding?

The SPEAKER. No; it does not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the point of no quorum still pending?

The SPEAKER. Why, no; the question of no quorum ended when the House adjourned.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was my inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can call for the regular order.

Mr. MURDOCK. An adjournment ends the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HENRY. This is only unanimous-consent matter. After that the regular order will come up.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the House can not turn a wheel without a quorum. Now, under the practice of the House there are two ways of finding out whether there is a quorum present or not. First, if a roll call shows that there is no quorum present, the Speaker must take notice of that fact. The other way is, if some gentleman raises the point of no quorum, the Speaker counts to determine whether a quorum is present or not. Outside of that, after the presence of a quorum is once developed on the first day of the session, it is evermore after that presumed that a quorum is present, unless the absence of a quorum is disclosed in one of the two ways mentioned. That has been the practice here for 20 years to my certain knowledge, and how much longer I do not know.

PUJO COMMITTEE MONEY TRUST REPORT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 9.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 100,000 additional copies of the report of the Pujo Money Trust committee on House resolution 429 and House resolution 504, 75,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be apportioned as follows: Five thousand to the Committee on Banking and Currency and 70,000 to the House document room; and 25,000 for the use of the Senate.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 2, strike out "one hundred" and insert "twenty-five."

In line 4, after the figures "504," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following:

"Ten thousand for the use of the House folding room, 10,000 for the use of the House document room, and 5,000 for the use of the Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives."

The Clerk read as follows:

The estimated cost will be $3,238.25.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HENRY. I suggest to the gentleman that he reserve the right to object, and let the gentleman from Indiana make a statement.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of another resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is the resolution called up by the gentleman from Indiana and objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY]? Is it a House resolution with Senate amendments?

Mr. BARNHART. No; it is a House concurrent resolution with committee amendments.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a privileged resolution providing for printing for the use of the House and Senate?

Mr. BARNHART. Just for the House.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a privileged resolution, and if the gentleman desires to get it up all he has got to do is to call it up.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged resolution, but the gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. GARNER. Very likely the gentleman from Indiana did not want to press the question of forcing the consideration of the resolution, under the agreement between the Members of the House, made some time ago, that matters would be considered only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the usual custom of the Committee on Printing is to present these matters by a request for unanimous consent for immediate consideration.

CHAPLAIN'S PRAYERS, SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 50,000 copies of House Document No. 1458, Sixty-second Congress, same being "Prayers offered at the opening of the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of this? Is there any amendment to it?

Mr. BARNHART. No.

Mr. MANN. What good purpose is to be served by printing 50,000 copies of the prayers offered at the opening of the House?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know that they would have any special effect on the gentleman's district, but it is the belief of the committee that the general welfare may be served.

Mr. BUTLER. They are "some" prayers.

Mr. MANN. It is possible that it might do the country some good to know that the House of Representatives is prayed for or prayed at, but I doubt the advisability of printing 50,000 copies. How much of a volume is this?

Mr. BARNHART. I think it is about 40 pages. It costs $1,702, or about 3½ cents each.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, let us have it.

Mr. MANN. It has never been done before, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER OF BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

The SPEAKER. Last February Gen. Barry wrote the Speaker a letter in which he resigned from the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home. Two or three days later he wrote another letter asking the Speaker to hold up the first one. In the rush of business in the last days of the session the whole thing was forgotten. The Chair lays before the House at this time the original letter, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PACIFIC BRANCH, SOLDIERS' HOME, CALIFORNIA,
February 21, 1913.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to tender you my resignation as a member of the Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to take effect February 28, 1913.

My reason for tendering this resignation is to enable me to accept the position as governor of the Pacific Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the duties of which I will assume March 1, 1913.

I wish to thank you, and through you the honorable body over which you preside, for the many courtesies shown me while a member of the Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

P. H. BARRY,
Member Board of Managers,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

LOBBY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of House resolution 198, providing for an investigation of the lobby. The Clerk will report the amendment which was pending when the House adjourned.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Congress," in line 9, page 3, the following:

"All meetings of said committee or any subcommittee shall be open to the public."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I think I offered an amendment in these words:

All meetings of said committee or of any subcommittee for the hearing of witnesses or the taking of testimony shall be open to the public.

I think the words "for the hearing of witnesses and the taking of testimony" should be included, and I move to have my amendment modified. That was my request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the original amendment and then the modification suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Congress," in line 9, page 3, the following:

"All meetings of said committee or any subcommittee, excepting only executive sessions, shall be open to the public."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I withdrew that amendment, and moved to amend by striking out the word "executive" and inserting "all meetings for the hearing of witnesses or the taking of testimony by any committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Meetings are very often held in which neither testimony is taken nor witnesses heard, but they are held for the purpose of hearing arguments. Does the gentleman want those to be private? Does he not want all to be public except executive sessions? It occurs to me that the first amendment offered by the gentleman covers the case, and that is the practice, so far as I am aware, which has been followed by all committees. In those upon which I have served, at least, the taking of testimony and the hearing of arguments have all been public, so far as I have any knowledge of what has happened, and I have served on a good many committees that have taken a good deal of testimony.

Mr. COOPER. I have known of hearings before State legislatures——

Mr. BARTLETT. But I am speaking about this Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. At a meeting of a Senate committee yesterday there was a secret hearing.

Mr. BARTLETT. But this is not the Senate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Here is a practice that we are trying to prevent.

Mr. COOPER. My idea is not to leave it to the discretion of any committee as to whether the meeting shall be open or secret.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not objecting to the amendment, because I do not think it does any harm and it may do good. I am suggesting that the gentleman's first amendment, providing that all meetings except executive sessions should be open to the public, covered the whole subject, both as to the hearing of testimony and argument. In other words, there would be only one exception.

Mr. COOPER. On last Saturday when I offered that amendment the gentleman from Illinois said that the word "executive" meant secret, so that my amendment meant all meetings except secret meetings shall be public. I said in reply to his statement that I had never before heard the expression "executive meeting" defined as meaning a meeting for the hearing of the testimony of witnesses. But as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested in the RECORD the possibility of such an interpretation of the words "executive meeting," I move to change my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment, and the Clerk will report the amendment which the gentleman from Wisconsin now offers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin can be found in large print at the bottom of page 2334.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to withdraw that amendment and present the following.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as now modified by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "Congress," in line 9, the following: "All meetings of said committee or any subcommittee for the taking of testimony or hearing of argument shall be open to the public."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment will not affect the action of any committee that is appointed to investigate these matters; but it is not surprising that the country itself looks at times with some suspicion upon Congress and its Members when it is seriously urged that it is necessary to incorporate in a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the truth or falsity of charges made against Members of Congress that that committee shall not sit in secret. If there be a doubt as to the integrity of Members of Congress, and if there be a suspicion as to the probity of its actions, it is largely due to the attitude of many Members of the House itself. For myself, feeling that way about this amendment, I shall vote against it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, it is a sufficient answer to what the gentleman from New York has said to call attention to the information just given us that the Senate committee investigating this matter did on yesterday hear the testimony of witnesses in secret. Now, if the Senate committee would do that, it is not a very violent presumption to say that the House committee, or a subcommittee, might also hold meetings in secret to hear witnesses. I do not think that in a matter of this transcendent importance it should be left to the discretion of men to say whether they will hear in secret the testimony of witnesses. Not at all. As I have before pointed out, when the original resolution for the investigation of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy came before the House it was so drawn that a meeting of the full committee must be public, but there was no requirement that a meeting of a subcommittee should be in public; and promptly upon that defect being pointed out the House so amended the resolution as to require that all meetings, whether of the full committee or any subcommittee, must be in public. What the House did then was absolutely right. Those hearings were all held in public, and reports of the testimony being sent broadcast over the country so aroused public opinion as to lead to justice being done to certain gentlemen who needed just such an exposure. And so in this case I can not conceive how any gentleman would want this question of public or secret meetings left to the discretion of a committee—and in saying this I, of course, do not have in mind the gentleman from New York, for he stands high in the House and none of us think that anything pertaining to this controversy will affect him in even the remotest degree—but I can not understand how any Member, confident as to his own record, should wish this committee or any subcommittee to have the opportunity to take testimony in secret, except possibly he has some friend whom he wishes to shield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if it were possible for my mental processes to operate in the same manner in which those of the gentleman from Wisconsin seem to operate, I would seriously consider having myself examined by some one in whom I had confidence.

No one is suggesting that there be any secret meetings. I do not fear these open meetings, and I have no friends, as the gentleman intimates, that I wish to have protected. I am not speaking in behalf of the Senate or anybody in it; I am simply expressing my confidence in my colleagues in this House, and

I do not believe any committee that could be appointed by the Speaker, even one upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin should be appointed, would even suggest or think of holding secret meetings. But the gentleman is continually, by innuendo, creating the suspicion that there might be some possibility of somebody being put upon this committee who would seek to "protect" a Member of the House. If I had such fears haunting me all the time, I would fear to associate with my colleagues in the House, because I would fear that perhaps unconsciously I was associating with somebody whose standard of rectitude was so far beneath mine that I might be contaminated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The debate on this amendment is closed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the Mulhall article, to which reference is made in the resolution and which brings about the investigation, was this statement, as published in the Chicago Tribune and the New York World:

CHAPTER III.

James Ely Watson aided to the nomination for governor by his dear friends, the manufacturers.

That is the caption. Then it says:

The year 1908 was a very active one for the National Association of Manufacturers, for in this year the organization started to elect one of its chief henchmen, James Ely Watson, as governor of Indiana.

And again:

About the 1st of February, at Rushville, Ind., I had an extended interview with Mr. Watson on the subject of his return to Congress. He informed me that there were a large number of his friends who wished him to run for governor of Indiana and that he would be in the field for this office.

And again:

Watson was extremely pleased with the results of the work of the National Association of Manufacturers that accomplished his nomination and became a great deal more subservient to the interests of the manufacturers in Washington after his nomination. He had, at the request of Mr. Emery and myself, three active members of the House Judiciary Committee removed. Among the three removed was Mr. George A. Pearre, who introduced the Pearre injunction bill, which was very obnoxious to the manufacturers, and in the place of the three men removed three very subservient members were appointed, Mr. Vreeland, of New York, and Mr. Bannon, of Ohio, being two of them. So this committee was fixed from that time on to make it impossible to get any legislation through unless it was O. K'd by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, when one lies in detail it is apt to carry more or less of conviction to those who hear the lies. Giving details of a matter of public notoriety is to make one believe that the person who makes the assertion makes a true one.

What are the facts in reference to this Judiciary Committee at this time? The public record of this House is open to the world.

In 1908 Mr. Watson, as narrated here, was nominated for governor of Indiana, and it was because he was so pleased with the nomination that he caused the retirement of three members of the Judiciary Committee and the appointment of three new members of the committee, two of whom were Mr. Bannon and Mr. Vreeland.

Now, first, Mr. Vreeland never was on the Judiciary Committee at any time. Such a bald lie as that ought not to escape the notice of an ordinary man of common intelligence, much less a man who pretended to have extraordinary intelligence, as this man did. Here is a statement that Mr. Vreeland was appointed "as a subservient member of the National Manufacturers' Association" on the Judiciary Committee, following the campaign for nomination in 1908, at the request of Mr. Watson.

Mr. Vreeland never was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary; was never appointed then or at any other time. Mr. Bannon, who is further mentioned, had then been on the Committee on the Judiciary for several years and never was reappointed after that time because he was not reelected as a Member of the House.

Here are lies in detail. I have a list of this committee in my hand for the different Congresses. Mr. Bannon, whom Mulhall says Mr. Watson had appointed to the Committee on the Judiciary because they, the National Manufacturers' Association, had supported him for the nomination for governor of Indiana in 1908, was appointed to the Committee on the Judiciary to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Gov. Gillette, of California, who had resigned on being elected governor, and Mr. Bannon was appointed in December, 1906.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The committee in the Fifty-ninth Congress consisted of Mr. Jenkins, of Wisconsin; Mr. Parker, of New Jersey; Mr. Alexander, of New York; Mr. Littlefield, of Maine; Mr. Nevin, of Ohio; Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Pearre, of Maryland; Mr. Gillette, of California; Mr. Tirrell, of Massachusetts; Mr. Sterling, of Illinois; Mr. Birdsall, of Iowa; Mr. Foster, of Indiana; Mr. De Armond, of Missouri; Mr. Smith, of Kentucky; Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama; Mr. HENRY, of Texas; Mr. Little, of Arkansas; and Mr. Brantley, of Georgia.

Mr. Gillette resigned when he was elected governor of California in 1906, and Mr. Bannon was appointed to succeed him. Mr. Little of Arkansas resigned. I believe he was elected governor of Arkansas. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was named by the Speaker to fill the vacancy caused by that resignation. Mr. SHERLEY declined to accept the appointment, as I recollect it, because it had not been recommended by the minority leader, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi.

In the next Congress, the Sixtieth Congress, which was elected in 1906, the first session meeting in December, 1907, the Judiciary Committee consisted of Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Alexander, Mr. Littlefield, Mr. Tirrell, Mr. Sterling, Mr. Foster, Mr. Bannon, Mr. Moon, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Diekema, of Michigan; Mr. Malby, of New York; Mr. Caulfield, of Missouri; Mr. De Armond; Mr. CLAYTON; Mr. HENRY, of Texas; Mr. Brantley; Mr. Reid, of Arkansas; and Mr. WEBB, of North Carolina. The only members of the Committee of the Judiciary of the Fifty-ninth Congress who were not appointed on the committee in the Sixtieth Congress were Mr. Nevin, of Ohio, who had not been reelected to Congress; Mr. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, who had not been reelected to Congress; Mr. Smith, of Kentucky, who had not been reelected to Congress; Mr. Little, of Arkansas, who had not been reelected to Congress; Mr. Birdsall, of Iowa, who, at his own request, was transferred from the Committee on the Judiciary to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and Mr. Pearre, of Maryland.

There was a difference of opinion for a long time between Mr. Pearre, of Maryland, and Speaker Cannon. I brought the two together. I know the reason why the Speaker had left Mr. Pearre off the Committee on the Judiciary. It had no relation to anything of this kind, and was purely a matter relating to a quorum and the health of Mr. Pearre.

In the Sixtieth Congress, which, as I say, was elected in 1906, the new Members were Mr. Moon, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Diekema, of Michigan; Mr. Malby, of New York; Mr. Caulfield, of Missouri; Mr. Reid, of Arkansas; and Mr. WEBB, of North Carolina. Of the membership, Mr. Littlefield resigned and Mr. Higgins, of Connecticut, was appointed to fill the vacancy. Otherwise there was no change in the membership of that committee.

In the Sixty-first Congress, elected in 1908, meeting at the extra session in the spring and summer of 1909—the first time that new members could be added to the committee except to fill vacancies—the members were Mr. Parker, of New Jersey; Mr. Tirrell, of Massachusetts; Mr. Sterling, of Illinois; Mr. Moon, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Diekema, of Michigan; Mr. Malby, of New York; Mr. Higgins, of Connecticut; Mr. Goebel, of Ohio; Mr. Denby, of Michigan; Mr. Howland, of Ohio; Mr. Nye, of Minnesota; Mr. Sheffield, of Rhode Island; Mr. De Armond, of Missouri; Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama; Mr. HENRY, of Texas; Mr. Brantley, of Georgia; Mr. Reid, of Arkansas; and Mr. WEBB, of North Carolina. The men on the committee in the Sixtieth Congress who were not appointed on the committee in the Sixty-first Congress were Mr. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, who was not reelected; Mr. Foster, of Indiana, who was not reelected; Mr. Bannon, of Ohio, who was not reelected; Mr. Caulfield, of Missouri, who was not reelected; and Mr. Alexander, of New York, who was appointed chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and hence went off the Committee on the Judiciary.

The new Members were Goebel, of Ohio; Denby, of Michigan; Howland, of Ohio; Nye, of Minnesota; and Sheffield, of Rhode Island.

During that summer Mr. De Armond passed away in the tragic manner which appealed so to our hearts, and Mr. CARLIN, of Virginia, was appointed to fill the vacancy.

Mr. Speaker, every word of the statement in this article, so far as it relates to these committee appointments, is a bold, open falsehood, proven by the open records of the House to be so, and I doubt not that most of the other statements, in so far as they reflect upon present or former Members of this House, are equally false. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's statement is very interesting, and I enjoyed listening to him as he detailed what he conceived to be the facts about a great many of these committee assignments.

We do not wish this investigation to become a partisan affair, but we owe it to ourselves to proceed intelligently while we are considering the resolution.

It was my honor to serve upon the Judiciary Committee for a number of years, and I recall some of the incidents to which the gentleman alludes, but, of course, I shall not undertake to detail any of them here to-day. But there are one or two points I wish to make, one in reference to the gentleman from Maryland, Hon. George A. Pearre, who was removed from the Committee on the Judiciary by Speaker Cannon.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] takes the House and the country into his confidence this morning and states that it was his pleasure to bring the former Speaker of the House of Representatives and Col. Pearre together and to have an understanding between them. From an authorized statement that was issued by Col. Pearre on yesterday from Cumberland, Md., his home, it seems to me that the offices of friendship of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will have to be called into requisition again in order to bring the former Speaker of the House and Col. Pearre together.

The statement was given to the New York World and is dated July 8. I wish to read to the House certain portions of this statement, as it was authorized by Col. Pearre. In part it says:

> Col. Mulhall's disclosures indubitably show that special privilege and the Republican Party walk arm in arm and that the divorce of this connection or the defeat of the Republican Party was essential to preservation of the people's rights.

Again, he says:

> The only other time when, I believe, the National Association of Manufacturers and Col. Mulhall used their baneful influence against me with success was in having Speaker Cannon depose me from the Committee on the Judiciary, without rhyme or reason, which I have always believed was done at the behest of these agencies. This is now corroborated by the disclosures of Col. Mulhall, who shows that the National Association of Manufacturers had control of John J. Jenkins, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and through the influence of James A. Watson, its candidate for governor in Indiana, prevailed on Speaker Cannon and the said John J. Jenkins to remove me from that committee in 1908 for the good, from their point of view, such removal would do in defeating me for renomination and reelection to Congress.
> At all events it looks as though the people were coming into their own, and denunciation of Col. Mulhall can in no way impair the value of his disclosures, certainly as far as his statements are sustained by documentary proofs.

Mr. Speaker, we all recall that Col. Pearre was removed from the Committee on the Judiciary, and we all remember at the time that there was considerable discussion about it. Col. Pearre had introduced what was known as an anti-injunction measure, and many of us had seen proper to join with some of the Republicans on the committee and endeavored to report that measure to the House of Representatives, but we were always confronted with opposition and failed in securing a report. If Col. Pearre's memory is bad, if he does not recollect the facts as they were, it is proper that we authorize this investigation in order that the ex-Speaker of the House and Col. Pearre may appear before the committee and meet each other on friendly terms and again discuss the matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. And in order, Mr. Speaker, that they may explain to the country their differences, and let us know the real facts in regard to the removal of Col. Pearre. It is the fact that he was on that committee. It is the fact that he was the author of an anti-injunction bill, and it is true that he was removed from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is true that that bill, along with others, was never reported from the Committee on the Judiciary until it was reorganized when the Democrats came into power, and then the Judiciary Committee reported the principles of the Pearre bill, and other meritorious measures, and passed them through this body. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to reflect upon any Member, nor upon the ex-Speaker, nor do I reflect upon them in this statement; but it is manifest justice that we make this resolution so broad that we can go into all details of these transactions and understand whether there was any power outside of the House of Representatives that was controlling the make-up of committees and through them the destiny of this Republic. I believe that when the Speaker appoints this committee it will be one of clean, able, courageous men, who will go to the bottom of all these transactions and do no injustice to any man, living or dead.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I think, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] introduced the first resolution, it is only just to him to read what one of the newspapers which first printed the charges of Col. Mulhall has to say about the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky:

> Before turning over the Mulhall correspondence to the United States Senate the World caused a careful search to be made for references in it to Congressman SHERLEY of Kentucky, CALDER of New York, Calderhead of Nebraska, and Hinshaw of Nebraska. Beyond references of a vague and unimportant character there were none.

That, of course, should be Calderhead, of Kansas, instead of Nebraska.

I think our friend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] need not feel—of course he has not felt—the slightest apprehension, though he may have been a little ill at ease to have charges, possibly misunderstood, circulated among the constituency which he so ably represents and in this House where he is so highly respected.

A few days ago the Chicago Tribune said:

> There are Congressmen mentioned in the Mulhall narrative who, the Tribune believes, will show that the circumstances which enabled Mulhall to put their names in his narrative were innocent. There are other Congressmen who may not be so fortunate. There are men who were Congressmen who will not be so fortunate.

The second of those sentences suggests that the investigation may make trouble for certain Members of the present House. The third and last sentence declares positively that it will make trouble for certain Members of prior Congresses.

There has been much abuse of Col. Mulhall, a man whom I never to my knowledge have seen nor had any communication with upon any subject at any time; but that does not meet the issue here. If four conspirators commit murder and one of them turns State's evidence, abuse of the accomplice does not acquit the others of murder. The question is whether murder was committed, and whether the defendants are guilty. Nor does abuse of newspapers, calling them unscrupulous and unworthy of belief and muckrakers, tend at all to meet the issue here involved. Gentlemen have not forgotten that Jefferson said that as between two countries, one of which had a written constitution and no free press and another destitute of a written constitution but possessing a free press, he was for the country without the written constitution but with the free press. There is nothing truer than that this Republic will endure just as long as and no longer than newspapers can be found who are not afraid to print what they believe to be the truth about the Government and about the men who make and the men who execute the laws.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for three minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. Gentlemen have loudly said, "What an outrage to print these charges against Members of the House of Representatives." Did anybody hear these gentlemen who declaim against the outrage of printing charges against Members of the House—did anybody hear them utter a word of protest when charges were printed in the newspapers affecting the integrity of certain judges of the Federal bench or when articles of impeachment were presented on this floor condemning these judges as corrupt? No; not one word. These gentlemen said, "Go ahead." Then the ermine of the judge was not too sacred. Well, what is there about the garb of Members of the House that makes it wrong for newspapers to print what they believe to be true about their official conduct?

I never have heard anything more preposterous than for gentlemen to rise here and denounce as infamous the mere printing of charges affecting Members of the House. The only question before the House is whether in this narrative of Mulhall there is truth, calling for an investigation. And the American people will not be satisfied without an investigation of the most rigid character. The House ought to be satisfied with nothing less than such an investigation, and it should require that all hearings must be public hearings.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. I will.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman think any man who has sat upon this floor, not knowing the facts, who called Mulhall a liar and the New York World a liar, is a fit man to serve upon this committee, having expressed an opinion? Does the gentleman think that man is fit to serve upon this committee?

Mr. COOPER. Well, I prefer to say nothing now concerning the personnel of the committee to be appointed. I leave that to the judgment of the Speaker. I have heard some intimations about the World's alleged lying, but I give it as my judgment that there is too much of what the gentleman from Illinois called "details"; there is too much printing in facsimile of letters and accounts and telegrams to justify any gentleman in saying that this is all a fraud.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY], page 3, line 9, was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY. Wait until we get through with the next paragraph of this resolution.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to reconsider is not in order. The House is considering this resolution by unanimous consent under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENRY. By agreement.

Mr. HAY. Well, by agreement under the five-minute rule. Under the five-minute rule when a bill is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a motion to reconsider an amendment which has been adopted is not in order, and, reasoning from that, this resolution being now considered by agreement under the five-minute rule a motion to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Is this resolution being considered by agreement?

Mr. HAY. It is being considered by agreement under the five-minute rule——

Mr. HENRY. It was presented as a privileged resolution.

Mr. HAY. It was presented as a privileged resolution, and when the House came to agree upon how it was to be considered it was agreed that general debate should not exceed one hour, and thereafter the resolution should be read and considered under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Now the Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is undoubtedly true, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that instead of pursuing an ordinary course which would be pursued in the House, where the gentleman in charge of the bill controls it and no one can offer an amendment without his consent, we are considering the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment. The gentleman from Virginia, however, failed to distinguish between the House considering a bill under the five-minute rule and the Committee of the Whole House considering a bill under the five-minute rule. The House in session can entertain a motion to reconsider. The Committee of the Whole can not entertain the motion to reconsider, and the reason is manifest.

The adoption of an amendment in the Committee of the Whole does not adopt an amendment. It is a mere recommendation to the House, and the House adopts the amendment, and after the House has adopted an amendment or agreed to an amendment recommended by a Committee of the Whole it could reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted. Now, the gentleman's position would put the House in a position where, having agreed to an amendment, there was no way by which the House could change its mind. In the Committee of the Whole when an amendment is agreed to it still has to be passed through the House; still has to run the gantlet of a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If the Speaker should hold that under proceedings of this kind, where it is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, any gentleman could rise in his place and make a motion to reconsider an amendment which had previously been adopted, where would the end come?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] a question. Does he hold that the House can not reconsider a vote by which an amendment is added to a bill?

Mr. GARNER. I certainly do not. But I do hold this, that there ought to be some rule or some way by which we could get through this resolution in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] a very easy way.

Mr. GARNER. Just a moment, if the gentleman will permit, because the Chair asked me a question. If a resolution that is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER. It is not being considered that way.

Mr. GARNER. I understood the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. No. The way of it is this: There had not been any agreement about it in any way. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has an hour, and he can move the previous question any time within the hour and shut out debate and amendments, and everything of the sort. It was in the House, not in any committee, and then the House entered into a modus vivendi by which they would debate the question for an hour in a general way and then proceed under the five-minute rule, throwing it open for amendment. That is the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and that is right.

Mr. HAY. What is the five-minute rule——

The SPEAKER. They agreed to the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAY. That is the point I make. In considering a bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole or in the Committee of the Whole it is not in order to make a motion to reconsider a vote by which an amendment is agreed to. Now, the bill being considered in the House the five-minute rule does not apply.

The SPEAKER. The only way the five-minute rule ever applied was that the House agreed it would take five minutes——

Mr. HAY. Very well, if the House agrees to that, then all the rules applying to the consideration of bills under the five-minute rule must apply to that agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, there is no rule in reference to the five-minute rule that prevents a motion for reconsideration at all. The prevention of the reconsideration is in the Committee of the Whole. A motion to recommit is not recognized in the Committee of the Whole, and the reason is that the action of the committee is not final. It still has to be agreed to by the House. The amendment has to be reported to the House and agreed to. That is the reason why the motion for reconsideration is not recognized.

Now, we frequently consider bills in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and it has always been held that that does not change the status of the House. The motion to reconsider is a motion of right in the House under the rules. The rules provide that any motion agreed to in the House is open to the motion for reconsideration until you have gone to a certain extent, where you stop. Now, we are in the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. According to the gentleman's logic, then, it would be in order at any time before this resolution is finished for any gentleman to rise in his seat and move to reconsider any of these paragraphs?

Mr. MANN. If he had recognition for that purpose he could.

Mr. GARNER. He does not have to be recognized for that purpose. If he has the right that he has in this House, under the gentleman's contention, he does not have to be recognized for that purpose, but can get recognition from the Chair to reconsider every paragraph in this resolution. There is no end to it; that is all.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman does not seem to know the way out of that difficulty. The motion for the previous question is operative at any time when presented in the House. Any Member who has charge of a bill, or anyone else, could make the motion if the House would agree to it.

Mr. GARNER. After you have gone into the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. There was no agreement about the five-minute rule. The motion for the previous question is in order until it operates. I dare say the House would not order the previous question until the resolution was read through, and would not permit obstruction if people endeavored to obstruct. The House has full control, under the rule, to protect itself and at the same time to guarantee fair treatment to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. There are certain motions that can be made in the House and that can also be made in the House as in Committee of the Whole which are not permissible in the Committee of the Whole. For instance, you can not have roll calls in Committee of the Whole, and you can not move the previous question in Committee of the Whole, and several other things not necessary to enumerate, all of which are permissible in the House, but not in Committee of the Whole.

Now, at this particular juncture the House is in rather a curious predicament. It is really not in the House acting as in Committee of the Whole. But here is a resolution which was presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], which was to be considered in the House. He had an hour. He might do as he pleased with that hour. He could move the previous question whenever he got ready. But if he let the hour slip by without moving the previous question, then the next gentleman who was recognized would have an hour. But everybody recognized that this was a resolution that everybody was interested in, and of a good deal of importance, and they fought it out more than an hour. So the gentleman from Texas and the rest of the gentlemen entered into an agreement by which they would have a general debate of an hour and then consider the resolution under the five-minute rule.

Now, if all these other things can be done in the House as in the Committee of the Whole that can not be done in the Committee of the Whole, the Chair thinks this motion to reconsider is proper to entertain.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will not make that statement, because a motion to reconsider is in order pending or after the motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that; but you can not go back and attend to all these amendments on that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know; but I hope the Chair will not decide that question offhand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not deciding it now, because he does not have to.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know if it would be in order to move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the table?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. What did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] inquire about?

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to know if a motion would be in order to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, am I not entitled to recognition?

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] rise?

Mr. HENRY. I have just stated that I wish to address the House for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was inquiring what the gentleman from Tennessee said. There were two or three Members speaking at once. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to be heard on his motion.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, am I not entitled to an answer to my parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] desires an answer to his parliamentary inquiry. His parliamentary inquiry is whether it is in order to lay this motion on the table. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. If the House tables this motion, will that carry everything with it?

The SPEAKER. It will carry everything.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the amendment, when it was offered on Saturday, to strike out the words "legal or," which, if agreed to, will have the effect of preventing the committee employing counsel to assist it.

I have not talked with anyone in regard to this matter except two or three gentlemen on the floor this morning; but while I was taking a little rest over Sunday it occurred to me that the House could not afford to endeavor to save a little money at the expense of its own reputation and its own honor.

I have confidence in the committee which will be appointed. I have served on special committees myself without counsel, and I should not like to see the committee which was appointed in this case come to rely upon an employed attorney for the work of investigation. On the other hand, I believe the committee ought to have the power and the privilege of employing counsel, either general or special, and that the House, in ordering an investigation as broad and comprehensive as this may be, ought to furnish the committee all the necessary facilities with which to carry on the work. I do not believe the House ought to endeavor to compel the seven gentlemen who will be appointed to do this work without the power of obtaining assistance, however good lawyers they may be. I learned a long time ago in the practice of the profession—and I wish it were not so long ago that I had practiced it—that the wisest lawyer was the one who employed other lawyers to do a large share of the work.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. I want to ask the gentleman if a committee of the United States Senate has not been carrying on a similar investigation for some weeks, and if that committee employed special counsel?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can answer the question just as well as I can, and probably with more knowledge.

Mr. HAY. They have not employed any.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it would be an improvement or not if they had employed counsel.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has reversed his position on this particular matter over Sunday. I want to say to the gentleman that when the matter was first proposed I was rather inclined to the idea that the committee ought to have the right to employ counsel, but I have reversed myself in the other direction. I ask the gentleman this question: Would it not be best to permit this committee to be named? We know the Speaker will name good lawyers and Members who are capable of conducting this examination, and should we not wait until he names them, and then permit them, if later on they desire to employ counsel, to come back and ask the House for that authority?

Mr. MANN. I appreciate that that may be done. On the other hand, what is the situation? We are appointing a committee of seven Members of this House to carry on an investigation. We hope that the report of that committee, at least if it is unanimous, will carry with it some confidence on the part of the people and the country. Yet in the House itself we have expressed our lack of confidence in the committee by ordering it to hold its meetings in public, when everybody knew they would be held in public without the order. Now another proposition is made: "We will not allow you to employ the assistance which you think you need."

I am willing to trust the committee, at least until some reason for lack of confidence is shown.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the RECORD of last Saturday, in which he stated that he thought if we want a real, genuine, quick, and thorough investigation we had better have no lawyers connected with it at all, either on the committee or employed by them.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have changed my mind about that also.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The gentleman changed his mind overnight on that.

Mr. MANN. A wise man sometimes changes his mind, and the gentleman knows the rest of it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has come around to the view that I entertained and advocated on last Saturday, that we ought to give this committee the right to employ counsel. It shows at least that he has a tendency to get right occasionally.

I consider this one of the most important features of the many important parts of this resolution. I want to appeal to the membership of this House to-day and to say that in setting ourselves right before the country we ought to show every disposition to give this committee plenary power to go into these charges, and we ought to give them every legitimate aid and facility in order to make a thorough investigation. Let us look at it in a common-sense everyday way. Suppose the Speaker appointed a committee of the ablest lawyers in the House, composed of seven Members. Those seven Members are busy with the questions of patronage, they are busy with their official duties, and with committee assignments. They have been here for months and months, and they are wearied, and it would be a most appropriate thing to turn these 20,000 documents, accounts, telegrams, and various data that have already been discovered over to a distinguished lawyer, who will take the evidence and put it into lawyerlike shape in order that he may present his case to the committee each day. We do not know what additional evidence may be discovered. These documents may point to other things that should be investigated, and I undertake to say in my place that there is no Member of Congress who has the time to go into all of these things as they should be looked into when we begin the real investigation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then the gentleman's contention is that the investigation will be made by the attorney and not by the committee?

Mr. HENRY. Not at all, not any more than it would be made by the judge or the jury who are trying a case when there are lawyers on both sides of the controversy, presenting each side to the best of their ability. This does not even require the employment of counsel, but it gives this committee, which you say you trust so thoroughly, the power to go and employ counsel whenever it becomes apparent that they should have legal aid, and I say that in order to make this investigation complete, in order to study it to the very bottom of the facts, the committee will ultimately need legal counsel.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HENRY. In just one moment. Notwithstanding the disparaging things that have been said about the Money Trust investigation, notwithstanding the reflections that have been made on the counsel and reiterated, I have a high regard for the membership of that committee that made that investigation, and I declare to the House that the investigation would have been almost a failure if counsel had not been employed who understood the facts of the case and understood how to run them down and to make a real case.

I now yield to my colleague [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. I want to say, to begin with, that I voted against the amendment to strike out these words, and I am in favor of this committee having the right to employ counsel if they see proper; but, at the same time, I do not think this is the same kind of resolution that the Money Trust investigation resolution was.

Mr. HENRY. Nor do I.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say also that I fully agree with the gentleman in his estimate of the importance of that investigation; but I believe a limitation ought to be put upon the fee that might be paid to any lawyer. Will the gentleman have any objection to a limitation of, say, not to exceed $5,000?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman in this way: This committee, that we trust, will put the limitation upon the amount. The Committee on Accounts must approve all of these accounts, and they will see that the committee does not abuse its power. I do not object to a limit if we can make it a practical thing, but I do not want to hamper the committee.

Mr. HARDY. We have gotten into the habit of paying pretty good sized fees. Quite able lawyers would be ready at any time to expend three or four or five months for a $5,000 fee, but custom largely fixes the size of fees, and if a man thinks he is employed by the House of Representatives his ideas of price rise at once. I believe if it were understood when this resolution were authorized that a reasonable limit for a fee is fixed, you would not have any trouble in getting a very able lawyer to assist this committee, if the committee saw fit to engage one, within the limit. There ought to be a limit fixed before counsel is engaged.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Accounts can bring in a resolution of that sort to-day fixing a limit and taking care of that part of the proposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not reflect on any Member of this House. I assume that every one will be able to exonerate himself from these charges, and those who should be exonerated can appear before that committee and in a very brief time can exonerate themselves. That is one of the smallest questions involved in this question, and the larger question——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. I will ask for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. The larger question and the broader question involved in this question is as to the charges made by Col. Mulhall, whether he appears to be a credible witness or not. It is stated in the public prints that he has furnished certain physical evidence of this gigantic conspiracy about which we have read so much. That will be the real question that we are dealing with after these honorable Members have been absolved from all blame and all criticism. Then we proceed to the greater question as to whether or not a certain coterie and set of men have been directing the affairs of the House and the Senate and governmental affairs in Washington City for the last decade or so, and in order to study those questions—and they should be studied—we want to put every aid and every facility at the disposal of this honorable and able committee of the House so that they may get at the real facts. I appeal to my brethren on the other side of this Chamber to vote with us to-day to reconsider this proposition and give that committee the power we have asked to give it by the motion to reconsider. It is an important matter, and then if there should be a failure in the investigation, if the charges of the New York World and the Chicago Tribune and the other papers are not sustained, no one can blame this House and say that we handicapped the committee and made it impossible for it to make a complete investigation. We free ourselves from all blame. Nobody can criticize us when we stand before the world and make provision for an adequate investigation and give this committee all the power that such a committee should have. Remember, not long ago there was a case pending in another body where they had two investigations. The first resolution so handicapped the committee that they were not able to make the investigation and report as the country desired. The controversy was renewed. Another investigation was made which had another outcome. Let us not repeat that history. Let us endow the committee with every power which they should have, and send them forth to explore these charges to the very bottom.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN and Mr. DECKER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize somebody in opposition to this proposition.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not speak for the purpose of influencing any other Member's vote on this proposition, but I realize that it is a very important vote and one that can be easily misunderstood, and therefore I desire to state the reasons for my vote. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who spoke on Saturday said that the greatest danger to the people of this country was not that we had a corrupt House of Representatives but that we had one made up too often of cowards. I want simply to state that I am going to vote against the motion to reconsider, for if I did not I would be a coward. I voted against the employment of a lawyer on Saturday and I have heard no reason advanced here to-day why I should vote differently now. And I do not vote that way on the ground of public economy. I would vote for any expenditure that I thought would add to the thoroughness of this investigation. I do not vote that way because I have any fault to find with the Money Trust investigation or with Mr. Untermyer. I want to pay my tribute to that great investigation and the great work of that attorney. I want to pay my tribute to lawyers as a profession. I believe it is one of the highest callings, but I believe the one in which we are now engaged is higher, the one of making laws for the people of a great Republic. I do not propose to stand here and vote for the employment of a lawyer on a question where all that is involved is a finding out of facts. The subject which justified the employment of Mr. Untermyer was a technical subject, calling for a peculiar and specialized knowledge and experience. It was a subject unfamiliar to the majority of the Members of this House. The subject with which this committee will have to deal will call for a knowledge of political events, political campaigns, parties, and issues. It will call for a knowledge of legislative procedure and a knowledge of human nature and an appreciation of common honesty. It is a subject familiar to all the Members of this House. The work of this committee will be to find the facts. They need not look for law; the law involved is the law of honor and fidelity. There are business men in this body and business men can find out the facts. There are newspaper men in this body—the able leader of the Progressive Party is a newspaper man—and newspaper men can find out facts. Aye, Mr. Speaker, if we need lawyers—I believe there are able lawyers in this body—some Members of this body were prominently considered for the head of the legal department of this country—and they would have filled the position with ability and honor.

It can not be said that the employment of a lawyer will make this investigation more impartial. I believe the country has confidence in the integrity of the great majority of the Members of this House, regardless of partisan politics. I believe it has confidence in the purpose of this House to make an impartial investigation of these charges. If the country has not that confidence in the Members of this House, its confidence will not be increased because the House hires its own lawyer to make its investigation for it.

Neither am I here to say that I hope that all the Members of this House will be exonerated. I believe in this investigation from the bottom of my heart, and I further believe—and I do not claim to speak with the knowledge the older men of this House should have—but I believe from all I have read in these great newspapers and from what I know of corroborating circumstances it is possible some few may not be able to exonerate themselves. The purpose of this committee is not exoneration. The purpose of this committee is to ascertain the facts. Of course in the light of facts let the innocent be exonerated and held most firmly in our faith, but also in the light of facts, impartially obtained, if there be guilty ones let them be condemned and held in our contempt. This is the solemn and unpleasant duty for this committee to perform, and as much as I respect the leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]—and I say it earnestly—I refuse to delegate this important duty to any hired lawyer in the United States. [Applause.] I want to leave it to men who will have to go back in two years and answer to the sovereign people of this country for the kind of an investigation that they have made. I am a lawyer. I know lawyers. I know their zeal. I know their fidelity to a trust. But I do not believe a lawyer employed in this matter could have a higher sense of obligation or a greater zeal than a man who stands before the bar of this House and swears to do his duty as a Representative in the Congress of the United States.

There are other duties for this committee to perform than to investigate the conduct of men who now are or have been Members of this House. Under this resolution it will be the duty of this committee to investigate the methods that have been employed to influence legislation in this country. We find no fault with honest men who take an active interest in the making of the country's laws. We find no fault with associations of men and women who strive to place their honest theories of government upon the statute books. We find no fault with business men, whether great or small, who take an interest in legislation which they think affects their welfare, nor does it matter whether those efforts are put forth by the parties interested themselves or by the medium of honorable agents. We are the servants of all the people, and it is our duty and our wish to listen to honest suggestions from whatever source they come. We are glad to lend a listening ear to all advice intended for the country's good, whether it comes from the highest or the humblest.

But it has been charged that there are organizations that exist for the purpose of controlling legislation, not in a way which they consider for the good of all, but in a way that will best subserve their selfish interests. Nor do they scruple much as to the methods used. It is charged that money has been used with profligacy to manufacture public sentiment, to subsidize, if possible, the public press, and even to corrupt the voters at the ballot box. It has been charged that agents of these organizations have endeavored by artifice and intrigue to win the confidence of the people's servants and swerve them from the path of right. It has been charged that by their boasted power to make or mar the fate of public men they have exerted their influence till they could say to Representatives, in the words of Mephisto gloating over Faust, "We have thee, body, soul, and all." How much of this is true and how much is false this is not the time to say. This is the time to let in the light. This is the time to seek the truth. This is the time to investigate with courage and relentless perseverance to the end that all things shall be revealed that touch upon the making of our laws, so that those who sit in the seats of the mighty and those who dwell in the humble homes shall know by whom the destiny of the Republic is controlled. Let publicity do its work, to the end that the guilty may be dismayed—that honest and long-trusted men may stand unsmirched, that slanderers may be confounded, and that those who sell pretended influence over legislation may find their occupation gone. Then, with the gloom of public doubt dispelled, with the clouds of misconception gone, with the pitfalls and devious paths designed by selfish interests made plain, with the light of information openly obtained, we as public servants may proceed in straightforward ways to do the people's will. This is the pressing need that calls this committee into existence, and this the opportunity for service which it meets. This is a work that calls for statesmanship. Would Daniel Webster, would Henry Clay have delegated this important work to lawyers? I do not mean to infer that the employment of a lawyer will destroy the usefulness of this committee, and I am for this resolution with or without the provision for an attorney. I want this investigation to be relentless, impartial, and far-reaching; but in my judgment it would be performed best by men commissioned by the people, who must answer to the people; men who, when the work is done, if they have done it well, will receive their country's praise, but who, if they have failed to do it well, will receive their country's blame.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend just a moment? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] propounded a parliamentary inquiry a short time ago as to whether a motion to lay the motion of the gentleman from Illinois on the table would carry the resolution with it.

Mr. MANN. That was not the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. After considering the matter, the Chair said he thought it would; but I have reflected on it, and while there do not seem to be any precedents on the subject, by analogy of what is done here and what everybody knows can be done, the Chair does not believe that to table this motion of the gentleman from Illinois would table the resolution.

Mr. MANN. If the Speaker will permit, I agree with him. I think there is a very common precedent, which possibly the Speaker had not thought of. When the question first arose I was under the impression it would carry the resolution. We always move to reconsider the vote by which a bill is passed and lay that on the table, and, of course, it does not carry the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is what made the Chair change his opinion about it, and if the question arises he will hold that it does not carry the resolution.

Now, for what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] rise?

Mr. AUSTIN. I rise for the purpose of moving to lay the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to reconsider this amendment, on the table.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY and Mr. MANN demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 78.

Mr. HENRY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. There is no quorum.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. MANN and Mr. HAY.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 86.

So the motion was lost.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from New York will not make his point of order until we have finished the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my point for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] withdraws his point of no quorum. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to reconsider the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands a division.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to reconsider the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY]. Those in favor of reconsideration will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-four gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-eight gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 84 and the noes are 68, and the motion to reconsider is carried. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are operating under a sort of agreement as to the business of the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] a moment ago, when the Speaker was about to announce the vote on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, made the point of no quorum, which he withdrew. Would it be fair to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] if he is willing to abide by the judgment of those who are here upon this proposition?

Mr. LEVY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am opposed to this resolution, and I believe if it were given a week longer before the country the people will denounce it. We have it before the Senate now, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate the opposition of the gentleman, so far as he is concerned, and I believe it is honest and sincere opposition. I believe the gentleman always is honest and sincere. But here is a large majority——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not of the House——

Mr. MANN. Of those who are here——

Mr. FITZGERALD. A majority of 10.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me to finish my sentence: Here is a large majority of the House who believe in passing a resolution for an investigation. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] is the only gentleman, I think, who has publicly objected to the resolution, although other gentlemen have said that they thought it was not necessary to have an investigation. I think it is vital that we pass the resolution to-day if we can.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that this resolution should pass to-day. I doubt the advisability of authorizing the employment of counsel at this time. If the committee were appointed and were to come into the House later and say that in its opinion it required the assistance of outside counsel, I should acquiesce in the recommendation of the committee and be willing to vote the authority to the committee to have the assistance of counsel. But I do not wish a committee appointed with the power to employ counsel to feel that it should employ counsel and devolve upon some lawyer the important work of making the original investigation of the documents and accept his judgment as to what should be done.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I would suggest to the House that if it voted again to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York, my colleague [Mr. LEVY], to strike out the words "legal or," the resolution would be passed to-day, and thereafter if the committee were appointed—and I have no knowledge of the proposed personnel of the committee—should bring in a report and express its belief that it required the assistance of some outside counsel, I would be willing to give it the authority to employ such counsel.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman speaks of the preliminary investigation and examination of papers and correspondence. Is not that the very time you need counsel, in going over and making up your case?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have served some time in this House and have served on some committees that have conducted very important investigations, and if I had had the assistance of a lawyer to do the work I should do as a member of the committee I would know very little about the matters before it. [Applause.] That is the trouble about the employment of counsel to assist committees of the House.

In my experience of 14 years in the House I know of but two instances in which counsel have been employed; one in the Pujo investigation, in which, because of the exceedingly technical nature of the subject, the average Member of the House knowing very little about the operations of great financial transactions and the complications of our financial system, I believe that a man like Mr. Untermyer, who knew very intimately many matters that were of importance, was of service. But the things that are to be investigated here are things that the Members of this House have more intimate knowledge about than any outside attorney, and if one were to be employed it would be necessary to educate him in the history of the public business in Congress for years past before he would be of any value whatever.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has finished his question, I will answer it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I have not quite finished it. I am expressing my opinion. Now, I believe that after this committee is appointed, whoever may be placed upon it, if after consideration of the subject they feel that it would be conducive to the thoroughness and effectiveness of the investigation to ask the House to authorize them to employ counsel, I would not hesitate to vote for a resolution giving them authority to employ as many counsel and as eminent counsel as they believed were necessary to develop the facts; but I would wish this committee not to be, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, so absorbed with matters of patronage and other duties that they would feel so fatigued that they would in effect turn over to a lawyer the important preliminary work.

No more important duty can devolve upon any Member of this House, if he be put upon that committee, than to devote all of his time and capacity and talents to demonstrating the truth or the falsity of the statements the subject of the proposed investigation, and he should put everything else aside in performing this public duty of such great importance. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will support the amendment of my colleague from New York [Mr. LEVY] so that this resolution may be passed to-day.

Mr. MANN. I yielded to the gentleman for so long a time, because I know that the gentleman has a very important engagement this afternoon and might not be able to be heard later.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. MANN. No; I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The truth is that this whole conversation is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the subject is debatable, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know the gentleman was debating the question.

Mr. MANN. I have not debated it very extensively yet. [Laughter.] I was trying to ascertain what power the House had this afternoon. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] willing to state whether he will take the judgment of the House on this question this afternoon, or whether, in case he does not have his way—I do not speak with criticism—the gentleman proposes to prevent the House going ahead?

Mr. LEVY. If the House chooses to strike out my amendment of Saturday——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it in order for two Members of the House to arrange a compromise in the presence of the House of Representatives out of order?

Mr. MANN. It is not out of order.

The SPEAKER. If the House sits by.

Mr. MANN. It is not out of order at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. A second parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the Levy amendment.

Mr. MANN. And I took the floor on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MURDOCK. How long a time has the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. It seems to me that time has been used ten times over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought this preliminary talk that was going on was by unanimous consent. Nobody was debating the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois has started in on his five minutes to debate the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I presume the gentleman from Kansas would prefer that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] and myself should go out in the lobby and arrange the matter instead of doing it in the open.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I desire to make my arrangements in the open. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. While the gentleman is making his open explanation, I wish he would tell me—because I am considerably puzzled—why he permitted us on the last session of this House to come within five minutes of concluding the consideration of this important resolution and then made the point of no quorum, to the inconvenience, not only of all of the Members of the House but a good deal to his own embarrassment, as his action has shown here to-day.

Mr. MANN. I am not embarrassed at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MURDOCK. It seems to me that the gentleman is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not be worried upon that score.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman answer my question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Why did he make the point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN. I will answer the gentleman on that when it is a vital question.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my colleague that the House decided this question by a vote of 86 to 33 on last Saturday, and I think this body understood it better then than it does to-day. I did not think it would be necessary for me to say a word about it. In my opinion the country is opposed to our employing counsel to assist in this investigation; in fact, I believe the country is opposed to this resolution, because an investigation of the same matter is already proceeding in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of the gentleman to make the point of no quorum if he does not have his way about it?

Mr. LEVY. If my amendment is adopted, I shall not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. Then I assume that the gentleman will not make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The question was taken; and, at the suggestion of the Chair, the House divided, and there were—ayes 82, nays 76.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has there been any agreement entered into to-day as to when the House will adjourn to when it adjourns to-day?

The SPEAKER. There has not been.

Mr. HENRY. Then it would be in order to adjourn until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. That would be what would happen if there is no agreement otherwise. The gentleman from Ohio demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. HENRY and Mr. LEVY to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, nays 83.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, before that question is decided, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York has made the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is none.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that we will have to adjourn——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this is an automatic call of the House. The House was dividing at the time the gentleman from New York made the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Levy amendment is to strike out——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to call the roll.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Levy amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Levy amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Levy amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 103, nays 104, answered "present" 10, not voting 212, as follows:

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye"; but I desire to be recorded as "present," being paired with Mr. WALLIN.

The name of Mr. METZ was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, pending the announcement of the roll call, I desire to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Nothing can be done in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVY. Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LEVY. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the proceedings under this call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). The Chair does not hear the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. I move to suspend the proceedings under this call of the House.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not think there has been any call of the House, has there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; there is a call of the House. It has not been completed. There is nothing in order now but a motion to adjourn.

The call of the House was completed.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 103, the nays 104, voting "present" 10, and the amendment is rejected. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. [Applause.] The Clerk will read.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill, as follows:

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk attest subpœnas during the recess of Congress. The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee, to be immediately available.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope this investigation will be so full, so thorough, and so far-reaching that it will take in a question submitted to the House a year and seven months ago—on the 4th day of December, 1911—when the able Representative from the first district of New York, the Empire State, the Hon. Martin W. Littleton, rose to a question of personal privilege and had read from the Clerk's desk an assault made upon his standing and character in connection with what is known as the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. Littleton delivered his speech from the center of the House, just in front of the desk that I used at that time. He had been appointed a member of that investigating committee, and his motive, his action, and his conduct were assailed through the columns of the Daily Press, of New York City. Being an honorable man, sensitive of his good name and his reputation, he appealed to the House for an investigation of the charges against him. He first addressed a letter to the chairman of that committee, Mr. STANLEY, of Kentucky. Mr. STANLEY in reply stated that the committee had no authority under the resolution creating it to undertake an investigation of that kind. On the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from New York, no one on the majority side having anything to say or any proposition to submit, the Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a special committee to investigate these charges. The Democratic leader on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], moved to refer that resolution to the Committee on Rules, where it was unacted upon.

I have known Mr. Littleton from his boyhood days, because he is a native of the district that I represent on this floor; and I not only knew him well and favorably for many, many years, but I have the good fortune of knowing and counting among my friends every member of his immediate family. His father is a worthy and respected citizen of Roane County, Tenn., was a brave and gallant Federal soldier, and so I felt hurt and humiliated that the conduct and rectitude of a man whom I loved and admired, a man whose public career and private character could not successfully be assailed in the public press or elsewhere, should appeal in vain, as Mr. Littleton did in that splendid, touching address here, for an investigation of the false and unfounded charges made by the officers of a so-called antitrust league. The men whose names have been published in the last few days, Martin and Lamar, in connection with the investigation being carried on at the other end of the Capitol, were, according to the statements then made by Mr. Littleton, the instigators and the authors of these cruel slanders that were carried in the columns of a New York paper. The Congress and the country suffered a loss when Mr. Littleton voluntarily retired. He is an honest, an able, a fearless, and a conscientious man. He has what every public man ought to have—the courage of his convictions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes' additional time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. In that personal address to the Members of the last Congress Mr. Littleton used this statement, which I think is opportune to repeat at this time. I will read it from the RECORD:

> Henry B. Martin has been meeting every week in New York, at the Waldorf Hotel and other places, one David B. Lamar. David B. Lamar is an unclean, crooked, indefensible operator in the Wall Street section. His record smells to heaven.

Then, in another part of this address, remembering the developments before the Senate investigating committee and the testimony in connection with Lamar, Martin, and Lauterbach, this quotation from Mr. Littleton's speech is impressive and well worth listening to:

> I hope I can keep within the strict restraints of decent language and leave it for you to infer that what was said and insinuated and what was meant to be insinuated was false—blackmail, dictated by falsehood and carried out in a spirit of criminal libel. [Applause.] Let me tell you that this bears the earmarks of the classical blackmailer.

Mr. Speaker, I hope, in the interest of fair play, in the interest of justice to a late Member, and I trust on our own account, that this investigating committee will pass upon this question that was raised by Mr. Littleton upon the floor of this House and write in their report in enduring and burning words a vindication of his honor and his manhood as a Representative in the American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to express myself at this time as being most heartily in favor of this resolution and in favor of a thorough and efficient investigation of all the matters referred to therein.

I would not make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, if I had not heard it said upon the floor of this House that those Members here who had voted against employing counsel at this time by this committee were opposed to the investigation. I want to say here and now that my vote upon that question was based upon the fact that I do not believe that it is a wise policy for the House of Representatives, sitting as defendants, to employ their own counsel to investigate their own cases. [Applause.]

If Members in this House and others are to be investigated, I want the lawyers of this House who are to be named on this committee to investigate. There is where I stood last Saturday, and there is where I stand to-day.

And, Mr. Speaker, I want it understood now that I do not take any stock in this universal cry that has gone up in this House that all of us are pure and without fault. Why, Mr. Speaker, for a man to stand upon this floor and contend that gives a lie to the history of practically every legislative body that ever assembled on earth. I do not know whether these men referred to by Mulhall are guilty or not. There are only three people in such cases who do know about such things, and they are the man himself, the fellow that corrupted him, and God Almighty [applause]; and God Almighty refusing to come here and testify, you have to find the other fellow or the guilty has got to tell it himself. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this House has overlooked one fact. Members have gotten up here and denounced Mulhall. Mulhall said that this association had gone into districts and sought to destroy Members of Congress who had opposed their purposes and plans; and Members of this House have stood here and denounced Mulhall in the face of the fact that the newspapers of this country published the statement that the Speaker of this House vindicated Mulhall in a statement in the papers, saying that it was true, so far as his district was concerned, and that they had tried in other days to slip up on him and defeat him. That is what the papers published. If they tried to defeat the Speaker of this House and take him out of here, how do you know whom else they have tried to defeat?

And that is the part of the investigation that I want this committee to go into. It makes but little difference whom you kick out of this House. That will be only the destruction of one man. But when an institution or an organization can invade the country and corrupt the men at the ballot box, you have corrupted your Government at its very fountain source. That is what I want investigated; that has been admitted here to be true; and yet some say that Mulhall is a liar. [Applause.]

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McDERMOTT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, June 29, an article appeared in the press of the country in which M. M. Mulhall accused me of being in the pay of the National Association of Manufacturers. This is an unjust and outrageous falsehood. I never received a cent from anybody belonging to this association. I have always cast my vote on the side of labor, and my votes will show this fact, and I am willing to let my record speak for itself with my people.

I am ready to go before any committee at any time and trust this investigation will be most thorough; and the result in my case will show a deep-laid conspiracy against me by Mulhall and others. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 3, line 14, after the word "Congress," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:
> "The expenses of said inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, upon vouchers approved by the select committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and by the Committee on Accounts, signed by the chairman thereof."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to comply with the usual provision that all vouchers shall be approved by the select committee, and also by the Committee on Accounts, before they are paid.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman from Illinois satisfied from his examination that this is in the usual form?

Mr. MANN. I am not absolutely certain that it is in the usual form.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But it carries out the practice, anyway?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. There is no question but that it carries out the spirit of the resolutions adopted heretofore. The practice has been that all these special-committee accounts should be audited by the committee itself, and that audit was verified by the chairman of the committee, and, in addition to that, there was the allowance of the account by the Committee on Accounts, audited by the chairman of that committee.

Mr. MANN. Of course, that is what the amendment provides.

Mr. LLOYD. That is what the amendment provides.

Mr. MANN. I had supposed that probably the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] would have an amendment covering this.

Mr. LLOYD. I did have an amendment, but this one is sufficiently good.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the last Congress the custom was adopted of providing that these accounts should first be approved by the committee, then signed by the chairman, and then approved by the Committee on Accounts and signed by the chairman of that committee. That was a change in the practice which had prevailed before that time, so far as my recollection goes. At any rate, it is a good practice, a very proper practice. The Committee on Rules certainly have no objection to it, and I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman will be adopted.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that that practice prevailed in the time when I was a Member of one or two select committees of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. The contingent fund of the House is under the control of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. And all payments out of that fund are presumed, under the law, to be upon vouchers authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts or by the Committee on Accounts, and when you authorize payments out of that fund it is presumed that you are to follow the usual course. I think this amendment is proper. It simply follows out what has been the custom, so far as I know, for years. I know by reason of the fact that when we had a number of investigations in which the chairmen of the committees were authorized to pay the expenses they were always submitted to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. I think that this carries out the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it carries out the law. The law requires all payments out of the contingent fund to be upon the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, insert as a new paragraph the following:
"Any Member of the House during the hearings before the committee or any of its subcommittees shall have the privilege of interrogating any person or persons making statements or testifying before said committee or subcommittees on matters affecting the subject of such hearings."

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, when the resolution providing for an investigation of the so-called Money Trust was before the Rules Committee during the last Congress, my colleague from Texas, Mr. HENRY, objected to me asking Mr. Untermyer, who appeared before his committee, any questions. I thereupon introduced a resolution amending the rules of the House, allowing any Representative in Congress to cross-examine or ask any question of any witness appearing before any of the committees of the House. The resolution was referred to the Rules Committee and never reported out.

It has always been a matter of courtesy to allow any Member of the House to ask questions of those appearing before the various committees. In my particular instance the questions which I would have asked of Mr. Untermyer, when he appeared before the Rules Committee, before the appointment of the committee to investigate the so-called Money Trust, would have been so comprehensive that I would have defeated the appointment of Mr. Untermyer as counsel of the Pujo committee, and at the same time probably defeated the resolution authorizing the appointment of that committee, because I would have brought out, when I examined Mr. Untermyer, that what we needed was remedial legislation and not investigation. If I had been allowed to proceed, I am convinced that the country would have saved thousands and thousands of dollars, and there would have been no semipanic of securities. There would have been proper remedial legislation, and we would not have been wrestling with an uncertain question as we are doing to-day.

My colleague from Texas, Mr. HENRY, the other day eulogized the Pujo committee and its counsel in these words:

It will redound to the good of this and generations coming after us.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to state that upon some proposition before the Committee on Rules, when he appeared, he did not have the opportunity of asking questions. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not mistaken in that? Is it not a fact that he appeared before the Committee on Rules and made a statement, and then moved to lay the proposition before the committee on the table?

Mr. LEVY. No; that was before or afterwards.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to this statement I desire to say that in the public and my estimation the investigation will go down in history as the most disastrous one to the financial and business interests of the country. It will take many years for the United States to recover its financial prestige throughout the world. This country was fast becoming the financial center of the world when this outrageous inquisition and investigation commenced its activities. It was an unfair and biased investigation for some particular reason that has not yet appeared.

The Pujo investigation has already depreciated securities in the United States to the extent of over $1,000,000,000; it has virtually restrained the building and extending of many more railroads throughout the United States. At the present time we need at least 100,000 more miles of railroads. The actions of this committee stayed and interfered with the marketing of any new railroad securities; it demoralized the market for all bonds and securities; and to-day every State, every county, every city, every town, and every village in this country has been injured by the Pujo committee.

If the evidence, which was partisan, could be analyzed to-day, it would show to the country that New York was instrumental in staying the panic of 1907; that as a financial center it has greatly aided in building up the railroad system of this country and has financiered every business enterprise and every municipal improvement throughout this great Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the names of the members of the investigating committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Mr. CLINE, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. RODDENBERY, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. WILLIS, and Mr. J. I. NOLAN.

ADDRESS OF SPEAKER CLARK AT GETTYSBURG.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune on the 3d of July to be present in the big tent on the battle field of Gettysburg when a number of patriotic addresses were made. I was particularly impressed by the beautiful, forceful, eloquent, and patriotic remarks made on that occasion by the Speaker of this House. [Applause.] I am fortunate enough to have a copy of those remarks by me, and I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing the Speaker's speech on that occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The speech is as follows:

SPEAKER CHAMP CLARK'S GETTYSBURG SPEECH.

"I was only 11 years old when Fort Sumter was fired on, and now my head is blossoming like the almond tree. I will tell you how I regard that awful contest and how the generation to which I belong looks upon it—as one of the most heroic chapters in the annals of mankind. I read English history as the prologue to American history. When I reflect upon the civil wars in England my judgment is with the stern, unfaltering, pious Roundheads, who at Worcester, Marston Moor, and Dunbar followed the great Oliver into battle shouting, 'God with us'; but my soul is fired with the recollection of the chivalric deeds of those gallant knights and gentlemen who charged under the silken banner of Prince Rupert in the cause of the Stuart king. Cold must be the heart of that American who is not proud to claim as countrymen the flower of the southern youth who charged up the slippery slopes of Gettysburg with peerless Pickett, or those unconquerable men in blue, who through three long and dreadful days held these beetling heights in face of fierce assaults. It was not southern valor or northern valor. It was, thank God, American valor; that valor which caused our Revolutionary fathers to throw their gage of battle in the face of the son of a hundred kings; that valor which animated Washington at Princeton, Brandywine, Monmouth, and Yorktown; that valor which upheld his famished men amid the unspeakable horrors of Valley Forge; that valor which sustained the soldiers who followed Arnold on that cruel winter's march through the woods of Canada and in the Christmas storming of Quebec, where Montgomery fell immortal; that valor which nerved Andrew Jackson and his raw militia on the ever-glorious 8th of January, when they humbled to the very dust the towering pride of that mighty monarchy upon whose dominions the sun never sets, and utterly routed the veterans of the Peninsula who had snatched from Napoleon's brow the iron crown of Charlemagne; that valor which at Buena Vista, Churubusco, and Chapultepec filled the world with its renown; that valor which wrote Davy Crockett's name above Leonidas and made the Alamo another shrine for freedom; that valor which begirts this land as with a wall of fire, forbidding all the nations of the earth to touch the ark of American liberty lest they die. Callous, indeed, must be the man who can not find something to admire in the colossal, benignant character of Abraham Lincoln or in the splendid career of Robert E. Lee.

"The soldiers of the North and the soldiers of the South were American freemen all, fighting like heroes for what they considered right. As such I honor them. As such I teach my children to cherish them.

"On Fame's eternal camping ground,
Their silent tents are spread;
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

"O my countrymen, it is an inspiring thing to be an American—a great, a glorious thing.

"When I look into the faces of my children my heart swells with ineffable pride to think that they are citizens of this mighty Republic, one and indivisible, built not for a day but for all time, and destined under God to be the dominating influence of all the centuries yet to be, dominating not by force of arms, not by the mailed hand, but by influencing men everywhere by the wholesomeness of our example to adopt our theory of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

"The words of Whittier's Centennial Hymn are as true to-day as when he wrote them in 1876:

"Our fathers' God! from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand,
We meet to-day, united, free,
And loyal to our land and Thee,
To thank Thee for the era done,
And trust Thee for the opening one.

* * * * *

"Oh make Thou us, through centuries long,
In peace secure, in justice strong;
Around our gift of freedom draw
The safeguards of Thy righteous law:
And, cast in some diviner mold,
Let the new cycle shame the old."

THE COMMERCE COURT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] be allowed one hour at the next meeting of the House in which to address the House in favor of continuing the Commerce Court and giving jurisdiction to the court to act on the so-called negative orders of the commission; and I wish to ask unanimous consent that I may be given one hour for myself in which to oppose the continuance of the Commerce Court and giving the court jurisdiction to act on the so-called negative orders of the commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that on the first day that the House meets, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of ordinary routine business, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] have an hour to address the House on the subject of the Commerce Court and that he [Mr. SIMS] have an hour after Mr. BROUSSARD is through.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this is going to be a joint debate by the two gentlemen on opposite sides?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURNETT. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. Will any Member be required to attend during that debate? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question——

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. In reference to the matter. Has a bill been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or is there a bill before the House abolishing the Commerce Court and providing for the disposition of the business now pending before it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but not reported at this session.

Mr. BARTLETT. The reason I ask the question, if I may be indulged for a moment, is, as the gentleman remembers, that there is pending before the Rules Committee a resolution directing the Appropriations Committee in the consideration of a proposed deficiency bill to enact legislation in reference to the abolition of the court. Now, the subcommittee on the deficiency bill have not yet acted on the bill, and I would suggest to the gentleman that if he expects to have legislation upon that there ought to be something done to get that bill in proper shape, because we are not a legislative committee.

Mr. SIMS. There is a rule introduced giving the committee——

Mr. BARTLETT. But there has been nothing done with the rule, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman require a rule in order to act?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not say that at all.

Mr. SIMS. I do not so understand.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee.

Mr. SIMS. I will say to the gentleman a rule has been prepared and introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON], and has been referred to the Committee on Rules, carrying out the purpose and spirit of the instructions of the caucus.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the Committee on Rules have not been able to devise any measure by which—and, by the way, they are not a legislative committee. In other words, neither the Rules Committee nor the Committee on Appropriations are legislative committees in the way of formulating legislation with a view to its enactment. The Committee on Appropriations have, under certain conditions, reported legislation, but here is the bill introduced into this House, pending before the proper committee, and it is suggested, instead of the committee reporting a bill to carry out the purpose, that the Appropriations Committee shall legislate and report out a bill containing legislation. I call the gentleman's attention to the anomalous condition of affairs upon which the proposed legislation now is. The Committee on Rules——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. In one moment. Now, having been opposed to the establishment of the Commerce Court, having time and time again voted to abolish it when I had the opportunity, why, I am interested in the matter, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the anomalous position in which the proposed legislation now is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. It will be brought before the House by the action of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield? In the last Congress the Appropriations Committee, without any rule previously authorizing them to do so, placed legislation in the legislative bill abolishing the court and giving jurisdiction to the district courts. A bill had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce prior to that, and some portions of that bill were placed in the appropriation bill that was passed, and then there was a rule adopted making it in order for committee amendments to be in order. At that time the appropriation bill was known by number, and the Rules Committee, I understand, no appropriation bill having been introduced, and not having the number or title of it, will wait until the bill is introduced.

Mr. BARTLETT. My reason for calling the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the matter was not for the purpose of hindering the legislation, but to call his attention to a matter in which he was interested, like a number of other Members of the House, and to the position in which the proposed legislation is. And we are not authorized to legislate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. What is the status in reference to the adjournment of the House so far as the agreement heretofore entered into is concerned?

The SPEAKER. There is no status about it. If somebody does not get consent for the House to adjourn to some other day, besides to-morrow, when the House adjourns to-day it will be until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. CARLIN. Was not there an agreement reached that that would be done, and adjournment be had for three days at a time until the 14th?

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair remembers it, there was a loose agreement that we adjourn three days at a time, but there was a positive agreement that the House should not take up any business except routine business, and then by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] has not the floor.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to relieve the situation, I withdraw my request.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 12 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. I would like to know when he expects to bring before the House the question of passing the bill, which has been reported here, to amend the Erdman Act. The bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and is a very pressing matter and one that we ought to act upon at the earliest possible date, in order to prevent a very great possible strike of the railway employees.

Mr. CARLIN. I will say to the gentleman it is the purpose of the committee to bring this matter to the attention of the House at the earliest possible moment, and I think we will do it on Saturday. That is my intention at present.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not possible to bring it up to-day and pass it? I do not think there is any objection to it anywhere.

Mr. CARLIN. I think not. There is a little confusion as to the status of the matter. There is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table and a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The two bills are not identical. There are some matters in reference to them I do not care to take the responsibility of determining until we have an opportunity to confer further about them. I am informed by those who are most interested in the matter at the department that a matter of two or three days will make no difference.

Mr. MANN. Is the Senate bill still on the Speaker's table?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; I understand the Senate bill is still on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at noon? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXPLANATION OF A VOTE.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I have just come over from an important committee meeting. I was not present when the matters in connection with this investigating committee were being discussed in the House, and I voted "aye" under a misapprehension.

Mr. MANN. That is on the Levy amendment?

Mr. KENT. Yes; that is on the Levy amendment. I intended to vote for the employment of counsel, and I wish to have that statement go into the RECORD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing the speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. CLARK of Florida, on the Fourth of July.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

SPEECH OF HON. FRANK CLARK, DELIVERED AT OCALA, SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1913.

"Ladies and gentlemen, fellow countrymen, profoundly grateful for the kind invitation extended me to be with you at this time, my heart swells with patriotic pride when I look upon the contented and happy faces of this magnificent audience composed of the very flower of Florida's proud citizenship. One hundred and thirty-seven years ago a new Government was born among the nations of the earth, and we, as part of that Government, have assembled ourselves together to celebrate this anniversary of its birth, to recall some of the incidents of its career, to take counsel with each other for the common good, and to further consecrate ourselves to the task of preserving constitutional government for the many generations to follow us in this land of liberty.

"It is well, my friends, that we should assemble on each recurring Fourth of July and give the day to reflection upon the past in our governmental affairs, consideration of the present, counsel for the future, and sincere thankfulness and deep gratitude to Almighty God, who in the abundance of His mercy and wisdom has watched over and directed the Republic in its course upon the sea of national life. It is not my purpose to-day to recount the causes which led to the birth of the Republic nor to dwell at any length upon the troubles and trials endured by the colonists in finally becoming separated from and independent of the mother country. It is enough to say that the one great underlying cause of separation was that desire to be free which in all ages and in all lands has ever found lodgment in the hearts of intelligent human beings. The inhabitants of the thirteen Colonies which stretched along the Atlantic seaboard believed that 'taxation without representation' was wrong; they believed in the doctrine of local self-government; they did not believe that they should be governed by some power across the seas; they believed that the Colonies should be free and independent States; and thus believing, they issued to the world that imperishable document which we now know as the Declaration of Independence, and placing their trust in the Creator of the Universe they struck the blow for liberty which after seven years of war gave to humanity this 'home of the brave and land of the free,' and established in the Western Hemisphere the best government ever seen upon the earth.

"That injustices have occurred under our Government, that wrongs have been perpetrated, and that sometimes the 'ship of state' has been steered far from her legitimate and proper course no man will deny; but, my friends, with all her errors, with all her faults, she is the best Government which God Almighty ever permitted to exist among men. When this Government was finally established and the young Republic started out on its mission, many were the predictions of failure. Self-government under a written constitution was the experiment to be tried, and the statesmen of the world watched with deep interest every movement affecting the interests of the new Government. There was in the beginning and has been all through the life of the Republic two great political parties contending for the mastery. One of these parties has always advocated a strong central government, with practically all power lodged in the Federal authorities, while the other party has strenuously contended that each State should be sovereign and independent, and that the central government could have no power except such as might be delegated to it by the States, and that no power should thus be delegated beyond such power as was essential to enable it to deal with foreign nations and to carry on the purposes of its creation. These contending forces continued until finally the right of a State to secede from the Union became the paramount issue between them, and this right asserted upon the one hand and denied on the other produced the war between the States. It is absolutely untrue that the institution of African slavery was a cause of that war; it was merely an incident of the war; and, as stated by Mr. Lincoln himself, the proclamation freeing the negro slaves was not issued as an act of humanity, nor was it issued because the war was prosecuted to accomplish the freedom of the negro, but it was issued solely because the necessities of the war demanded it. Unable to settle the question of the right of a State to secede from the Union in the forum of congressional debate, an appeal was had to arms, and for four long years the cruel fratricidal struggle raged, while the civilized world, watching the titanic struggle, wondered if the result would mean the death of self-government among men. Finally the issue was determined by the stern arbitrament of war, and that tribunal decreed that this was 'an indissoluble Union of indestructible States.' It is well.

"As the son of a Confederate soldier, looking back over nearly half a century since the war ended, I can and do say that it is best that we have 'an indissoluble Union of indestructible States,' so that 'government of the people, by the people, for the people' shall not perish from the earth.

"As a son of a Confederate soldier, as a son of the South, whose every sentiment is southern and whose life is dedicated to the service of the South, I am deeply gratified with the increasing interest shown throughout the Southland in the patriotic observance of the Nation's birthday. And why should not we of the South glory in this day? This is our country, Old Glory is our flag. The Fourth of July is our day. We did our part in establishing the Government; we have done our part in nurturing it; and the best blood of the South spilled upon every field of battle with a foreign foe eloquently proclaims the story of how we have defended it.

"When the weak, struggling Colonies were suffering the wrongs of British rule, it was the eloquent voice of Patrick Henry, of Virginia, which stirred the patriots to action with the immortal words, 'Give me liberty or give me death.'

"When our fathers had determined to throw off the British yoke another son of the South, Thomas Jefferson, wrote the Declaration of Independence, which will live in the hearts of men as long as liberty has a habitation and a home.

"When the Constitution, the chart of our liberties, was to be written, the man of the hour, in the person of James Madison, is furnished by the Old Dominion. When the tocsin of war sounded and the colonists needed a leader, a general to lead them in battle, again one of Virginia's sons came to the front, and after seven years of trial, trouble, and bloodshed George Washington led them to victory.

"After the war had ended and a strong, wise, and safe statesman was needed at the helm to guide the ship of state safely on her journey, all eyes looked toward the Southland, and there was an unanimous call for George Washington to become the first President of the young Republic.

"In 1812, when England for the second time sought to try conclusions with us on the field of battle, Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, led the armies of the Union to victory. John Marshall, of Virginia, builded for us a system of jurisprudence which has challenged the admiration of the bench and bar of other nations.

"When we became involved in war with Mexico, Winfield Scott, Zachary Taylor, and Jefferson Davis, all southern men, carried Old Glory into the Halls of the Montezumas.

"Only 15 years ago the call to arms again resounded throughout the land, and when Shafter of the North answered 'Ready,' that grizzled veteran of the South, Fitzhugh Lee, said, 'Here am I.' And when Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, answered the call of his country, Gen. Joe Wheeler, of Alabama, said, 'I'll go too.' And when the call for troops was issued the very flower of the young manhood of the South came rushing to the defense of the flag. I am glad the Spanish-American War occurred. It is true that some lives were lost and millions of money was spent, but it silenced forever the voice of the bloody-shirt demagogue who for all these years has been questioning the good faith of the South, and it demonstrated to all the world that this is an 'indissoluble Union of indestructible States.' Yes, this is our country, my friends, and I thank God that the South is again taking her rightful stand in the affairs of our Government.

"To-day there sits in the Executive chair at Washington a son of Virginia, and presiding over the White House, as the 'first lady' of the land, is a Georgia girl. Woodrow Wilson is bringing to his high office a simplicity and integrity of purpose which characterized the earlier and better days of the Republic. Sitting around the Cabinet table of the President, among his advisers, is Postmaster General Albert S. Burleson, of the State of Texas, with whom I served eight years in the House of Representatives, and whose ability and integrity is of the highest type, and whose conduct of his high office is reflecting great credit on the administration; Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina; Attorney General James C. McReynolds, of Tennessee; Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo; and Secretary of Agriculture Houston, making in all five southern men who are members of the President's Cabinet, and all of whom are able, clean, and patriotic.

"Presiding over the House of Representatives, the greatest law-making body in the world, is one of the ablest, cleanest, and best men who ever occupied that exalted position. CHAMP CLARK is a southern man who is proud of the fact and is as patriotic an American citizen as lives within the domain of our great Republic.

"The gallant young leader of the Democratic hosts on the floor of the House is OSCAR UNDERWOOD, of Alabama. Strong, able, and sincere, his leadership is without a flaw, and his integrity and patriotism are beyond question.

"Last, but not least, there sits upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, the greatest judicial tribunal on the earth, and as Chief Justice of that body, a southern man who was a Confederate soldier—Chief Justice White, of Louisiana.

"I mention these facts, my friends, not for the purpose of exalting the men of one section of our common country over those of another section, but simply to demonstrate that we are, in deed and in truth, a reunited and contented people, and the people of all sections are playing their proper part in the affairs of government. This is our country, and my heart is made to rejoice when I remember what is taking place in another State of the Union. In the great State of Pennsylvania to-day, on the battle field of Gettysburg, is a scene the like of which the world never saw before. Fifty years ago the bloodiest and most fiercely contested battle of the War between the States was fought at Gettysburg. It was there that 'Pickett's charge,' the bravest charge ever made in any war, drenched the fields of Gettysburg in blood and placed the soldiery of Meade and Lee on the roll of the earth's immortals. There it is where a few months later Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States, delivered his immortal 'Gettysburg address.' To-day another President of the United States is speaking to the people assembled at Gettysburg. Woodrow Wilson, a Virginian, President of the United States, is talking to the assembled multitude. The survivors of those who faced each other in deadly struggle there 50 years ago are facing each other there to-day. The torn, tattered, and blood-stained battle flags are there; the uniforms of blue and of gray are there; there is a 'thin blue line' and a 'thin gray line'; but the boom of cannon, the rattle of musketry, and the gleam of bayonet will not be there. The men in 'blue and gray,' the remnants of the two great armies of Meade and Lee, who meet at Gettysburg to-day meet as friends, they meet as brothers, they meet as citizens of a common country owing allegiance to a common flag. The great majority of their comrades have gone to that 'bourne from whence no traveler returns'; and while these former foes fraternize at Gettysburg to-day, it seems to me that the Ruler of Heaven will draw aside the veil and allow the followers of Meade and of Lee to gaze upon this picture of consecrated reunion."

Mr. BARCHFELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by the Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARCHFELD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

PERSONAL LIBERTY.

(Speech of Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT at the celebration of German Day at Johnstown, Pa., June 16, 1913.)

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have most gladly responded to the kind invitation of your committee to celebrate German Day with the citizens of Johnstown, a city named after and founded by a distinguished German pioneer whose memory you so fittingly honored on yesterday. What I am going to say to you will not be in the nature of a eulogy of the German element and its achievements on American soil, although I admit a beautiful story, worthy of a real orator, could be told with that subject as a theme. But such praise will sound much better, I imagine, when coming from other than German lips. I do believe this to be a fitting occasion, however, to call attention to a trait of German character which is, or ought to be, an attribute of good American citizenship, and which, therefore, makes the Germans good American citizens by nature, and that is love of liberty. It was the spirit of freedom, so history tells us, which inspired them to follow the banners of the Father of the Country in the Revolutionary War; it was the same spirit which moved them to rally around the flags of the Union and Abraham Lincoln in the Civil War, and it is nothing but love of liberty, I venture to say, which to-day determines their attitude of manly opposition against prohibitory legislation and against all attempts at regulating a man's personal conduct by law. It is now the universal judgment that the Germans were right when they fought for American independence, as also when they spilled their blood for the preservation of the Union and the emancipation of the slaves; but what I have come here to say is that I believe they are right to-day. In fact, I am convinced that the defense of personal liberty against the encroachments of sumptuary laws is as much the duty of every good American citizen as is the defense of his country against foreign invasion, for you must remember there is no liberty other than that of the individual man, and the nation which is so indifferent as to permit its restriction in anything which is not morally wrong is either no longer free or is in imminent danger of losing its freedom.

"'Eternal vigilance,' we know, 'is the price of liberty.' Have we been vigilant? Or is it not true that, while we were quarreling with our neighbor about the trusts, the tariff, and all this progressive business, somebody burglarized our house and stole the crown jewels of our political heritage? Alas, it is only too true, my friends, but I should not be surprised if some of you did not know it, because both the press and the politicians, by their convenient silence, were and are aiding the burglars in their escape. But somebody has to speak out and German Day, I think, is as good an occasion as any to do it. Are you aware that the last Congress, composed of a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, passed a prohibition measure by more than a two-thirds majority? And that the lawyers who constitute 85 per cent of the membership either knew it to be unconstitutional or had serious doubts about it, but voted for it anyhow? It is a fact. President Taft, true to his oath to defend the Constitution, had the courage to veto that bill, but the same two-thirds majority, although they had taken identically the same oath as the President, passed it over his veto. When things have come to such a pass that responsible lawmakers will overthrow the Constitution for a popular fad, do you not agree with me that our liberties, for which the Constitution is our only guaranty, are in the greatest possible danger?

"And there is every reason to fear that this is only the entering wedge. When this field of legislation is once entered upon, no one can tell where it will stop. To-day we are told that because one man out of a hundred drinks to excess the other 99 must be put in a class with him and be deprived of their individual rights and liberties. To-morrow the same tactics may be pursued against the consumers of tobacco, coffee, and what not, and surely there is no less reason for that than there is for the war on the lighter beverages. Then, on the ground of religion, people are deprived of their Sunday pleasures—a clear violation, by the way, of the American principle of a strict separation of church and state—and from these beginnings you can see it will not be a far step to a condition where we will be told by law how to dress, what books to read, what church to worship in, to what schools we are to send our children, what to eat and drink, and where to go and where not to go. This is what is called sumptuary legislation, and there is at the present time unquestionably a trend in that direction not only in all our State legislatures, but also in Congress.

"Before I proceed to tell you why, from my viewpoint, all this is wrong, let me show you what is behind it. It is really a struggle between two civilizations, the puritanical on the one hand and the Germanic or liberal on the other. Let us see how they differ. If my friend here is a Puritan, he believes all of life's pleasures to be more or less wicked and displeasing to God, while I believe in the joy of living. He casts his eyes downward in pious resignation; I turn mine up to the light of heaven in joyous expectancy of the good things to come. He wants you to creep along in the shadow of gloom; I want you to bask in the sunshine of happiness; and the happy laughter of men, women, and children, shocking to him, is sweet music in my ears. He believes, too, that man is made for Sunday, while I hold that Sunday is made for man. And there is another great difference. The Puritans dislike all merrymaking, but especially do they abhor public amusements, and if they had their way they would banish every display of gayety to within the four walls of the house. The Germans believe in and practice the very opposite. Nearly all their pleasures are public, they preferring always to make merry in company of their wives and children, their friends and comrades, and in places where everybody can know and see what they are doing. In the very nature of things these enjoyments are bound to be wholly innocent, but we can only wish we could say as much of the private doings behind closed doors.

"The struggle between these two wholly different theories of life is on, my friends, and it is becoming fiercer every day. The attempts to further and further restrict our liberties in a Puritan sense are carried on in the garb of a religious movement, and the ministers of all churches and the members of all congregations are constantly called upon for support and money to maintain lobbies in both the National and State capitals; and these lobbyists are cracking the whip over our lawmakers and are urging them on to pass more and more restrictive laws—laws which, in their mistaken zeal, they believe will make people good. I do not exaggerate, my friends, when I say that if this movement is not stopped, and stopped soon, the American people before long will find themselves wrapped up in a network of 'don'ts' which will completely hamper their freedom of action; and instead of being freemen in all matters of personal conduct they will be slaves fettered by the chains of un-American laws.

"Permit me, in this connection, to call attention to a most remarkable fact, namely, that the people in many cases actually vote to enslave themselves. History tells us of despots who kept their subjects in perpetual serfdom and of rulers who robbed the people of their freedom, but there is no case on record, so far as we know, where the people of their own volition and by their own votes robbed themselves of their birthright. The United States is the first example of this kind. The history of the human race is a constant struggle for liberty, and every concession wrung from its oppressors was heralded as a new triumph of progress and civilization. Here we have the example of a generation which, though born free, voluntarily surrenders its social liberty and forges with its own hand the fetters of slavery. Now, can you account for that? Is it because we do not sufficiently appreciate our heritage on the theory that what you inherit and what comes to you easily you do not value as highly as what you have to fight for yourselves? Or is it because the people do not fully realize just what they are doing by joining forces with those who are conspiring against their highest interests? I leave these questions for you to answer. Perhaps we are guilty on both counts. Certain it is that no nation will ever be able to preserve its liberty which fails to fully comprehend its spirit and its meaning. And what are we doing to make the young generation to understand it? Not one thing. There is no instruction in the public schools either on the science of government or on the fundamentals of our rights and privileges as citizens of a republic. In a monarchy such education may be unnecessary, because there the people simply obey the mandates of the government; but in a republic all citizens should be fully enlightened on such questions, for the simple reason that they are the government themselves. In the absence of such enlightenment and under circumstances which leave many people ignorant of and consequently indifferent as to their rights and liberties it is not at all surprising that shrewd schemers and conspirators should find it easy to rob them of their political heritage. This may be one explanation of the deplorable fact that this robbery is actually and constantly occurring in all parts of the country, under the very eyes of the people and largely even with their consent and cooperation.

"Now, I have an abiding faith in the good, sound sense of the American people and am confident that once they see through the bargain by which they are selling their birthright for a mess of pottage they will quickly drive the Pharisees from the temple. Therefore let us understand what is really at stake. What is personal liberty? Freedom of action, the right to do that which is not morally wrong and does not interfere with an equal right of our fellow man. Well and good. According to that, if we steal our neighbor's property or disturb his peace, we are doing what is morally wrong and interferes with the neighbor's rights, and should, therefore, be prohibited by law. But, on the other hand, if we drink a glass of water, or even something stronger, in front of the neighbor's house, this action is neither wrong nor an interference with him and, therefore, no law should prohibit it. Here we have the clear line of demarcation where prohibitive law should stop. The objection to sumptuary laws is that they do not stop there, but undertake to prohibit and punish acts which are right in themselves and in perfect harmony with the peace, morals, and good order of society. Gladstone defines liberty as 'the power of doing whatever the laws permit.' While this is a correct legal definition, you can readily see that the laws might be such as to leave no liberty whatever. It might be liberty with the gallows alongside of it and extend only to the length of a chain. Therefore, I say, no nation which desires to be free must ever permit the invasion, by law, of inherent human rights such as eating and drinking and as pertain to the innocent habits and customs of the people. These are inalienable rights, which means that they can not be taken away, except under a despotic and tyrannical government, either by law or even a vote of the majority. Those who are now at work throttling these liberties under the pretense of curing a supposed evil are, in the language of Abraham Lincoln, 'the vanguard, the miners and sappers of returning despotism.' 'We must repulse them,' he said, 'or they will subjugate us.'

"This, my friends, is the issue. In its moral, social, and political aspects it overshadows in importance every other issue of the present day, although the politicians are dodging it in every way possible. The reformers, the 'better-than-thous,' are evidently no longer imbued with the American spirit. They sneer at us when we assert the principle of personal liberty. They say it is only a question of drink, and the only persons interested are those in the business. For a mere fad and to gratify their whims they are ready to barter the constitutional guaranties of the American Bill of Rights for laws that will put the people under perpetual guardianship. And many a good man they have fooled; but, after all, I believe with Abraham Lincoln that you can not fool all the people all the time. For one I would not wish to insult the American people by the assertion that when their liberties are in jeopardy they would be willing to rely for their sole protection on the 'liquor men.' Let me tell these reformers here and now that there is a principle at stake in this matter in which every man, woman, and child in the United States is vitally interested and upon the preservation of which depends the stability of our free institutions.

"The Bill of Rights in the Federal Constitution is the charter of American liberty. This charter is the work of ages, the result of human effort to fix upon a mode of association among men called, in its higher form, government. It reads as follows: 'No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall'—listen to this—'any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.' In former times the danger of violation of such guaranties was from arbitrary power sought to be exercised by kings; to-day the danger lies in the assertion of supreme power on the part of self-appointed guides of the people, who by intimidation and threats force their opinion on Congress, legislatures, and courts and cause them to subvert the clear meaning of those guaranties. The authority of the Constitution itself is held in some quarters to be inferior to the opinion of voters or of organized cults in a referendum. Let me warn you, my friends, that such unsettling of all foundations of liberty is the pendulum swing from kingly tyranny to popular tyranny, and we can not wake up too soon to meet this danger. When a century or more ago England's liberty was similarly threatened a great bishop exclaimed: 'I would see England free rather than sober,' intimating that the right of the people to regulate their own conduct was more important than any legal remedy that might be offered to cure the evil of excessive drinking.

"On behalf of those who are gathered here to-day, I believe it can truly be said that they understand this question and realize the danger of the country-wide agitation which aims to supplant the right of self-control with a system of statutory guardianship. They also know that, aside from the political features which I have discussed, there are important considerations of policy involved in this question. The Germans, as a rule, are most temperate people, and, what is more, they despise drunkenness and would go to any length in helping to suppress it. But they are not so childish as to imagine that this could successfully be done by law. They know, as every sensible man knows, that as you can not make a man honest by statute you can not regulate his habits by such means. At the bottom of all so-called temperance legislation is the erroneous idea that you can regulate the appetite by removing the opportunity to appease it. 'Let us remove the temptation,' is the battle cry of our would-be reformers. I wonder where we would land if this policy were applied to all kinds of temptation. First, we would have to abolish all money and all property, because its existence tempts people to steal it; and then we should have to do away with all food and sweets and fruits, for there is always danger of overeating; and, finally, there are the sexual temptations, and so forth. When society would finally get through removing everything that might tempt man or woman, why, there would be nothing left but stones to cry to heaven bewailing the idiocy of man. No; our theory is not to remove the temptation, but by moral influences to strengthen man's resistance against it. We believe in stimulating the pride of manhood and womanhood and in rearing a race of people who can control and govern themselves properly in all matters of private conduct, realizing, as we do, that such people alone are fit to practice public virtues and to assume the duties and responsibilities of free citizenship. If the people can not be trusted to shape their habits properly, how, I ask, can they be trusted with the ballot? The fact is, a man's actions are solely controlled by his own mind and conscience, being the results of his opinions and inner convictions, and we know that these can only be formed by good example, moral suasion, and education.

"These are theories, true, but practical experience teaches us that they are correct and that the moralists and reformers are on the wrong track. Are you aware how surprisingly insignificant the effect is of all the laws which by ceaseless agitation and by a waste of immense amounts of money they have succeeded in placing on the statute books? Why, despite the fact that half of the territory of the Union is supposed to be dry the consumption of liquor has tremendously increased, much more rapidly, in fact, than the population. The only perceptible effect of their agitation—which, however, from the standpoint of true temperance is most deplorable—is that it seems to have encouraged the consumption of strong drink at the expense of the milder beverages. Will you not agree with me when I say that in the face of this complete failure to achieve desired results, all those good men and women who constantly haunt legislative halls to invoke the power of the Government for their purposes would do much better by staying at home to imbue their children with right ideas of virtue, morality, and moderation?

"The great and all-absorbing question is: What are we going to do about it? Are we to stand meekly by while the fetters are being put on us, or shall we organize to manfully oppose the enactment of laws which rudely interfere with our innocent habits and customs? I am glad to say that as far as the American citizens of German birth and descent are concerned, those questions have already been answered. True to the ideals of Germanic civilization, they have organized the German-American Alliance to oppose all these unholy attempts at puritanizing the United States, to defend the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution, and to uphold at all hazards the cherished traditions handed down to us by the founders of the Republic. Whether they will stand alone in this fight or not is immaterial as long as they are conscious of being right and of occupying safe American ground. And now let me conclude with a prophecy: Every observing man can see that American liberty is in distress. If neither of the great political parties will have the courage to come to its rescue, a great new party is destined to enter the arena, composed of all the liberal-thinking men of the Nation and determined to enforce our great Bill of Rights in letter and in spirit, and to verify, if need be, the inscription written on their flying banners in the immortal words of Patrick Henry: 'Give me liberty or give me death!'"

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 10, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE ARMY (S. DOC. NO. 124).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the Senate of May 1, 1913, a statement as called for in paragraph 4 of the resolution, showing the avocations in civil life of retired officers of the Army who are engaged in such avocations as reported by themselves upon call from the War Department, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of the Just Franchise League, of Talbot County, Md., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Natchez, Miss., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Natchez Chamber of Commerce relative to the governmental control of the Mississippi River.

Whereas the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico is not only the great natural artery of our interstate commerce and the natural outlet through which the excess of the production of our great valley above what is needed for home consumption should seek a market in foreign lands, but is also the channel provided by the Creator through which the accumulated waters from rains and snows flowing from 31 States of our Union must finally reach the ocean; and

Whereas the disastrous overflows of the two successive years of 1912 and 1913—bringing terror to the hearts and causing untold anguish to the minds of thousands of men and women, and whereby hundreds of lives were lost, millions of dollars in property were destroyed, traffic by rail was interrupted, and business was paralyzed through a large section of our common country—have served to demonstrate that our present system of levees is utterly inadequate to restrain within proper bounds the accumulated floods of waters which annually flow southward to the Gulf of Mexico, and have further served to demonstrate the fact that the problem before us is a national problem and one which can be properly handled only by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the tremendous damage and destruction of property in the States of the lower Mississippi Valley does not result from conditions in those States alone but from conditions in many States, and can not be averted or prevented by the individual States directly and most disastrously affected, but can only be controlled and prevented by the Federal Government, whose power and authority extend to all the States; and

Whereas the situation is one that demands prompt and governmental action, with constitutional limits, accompanied by largely increased appropriations to be expended under the direction of the most experienced and skilled engineers in order to prevent a recurrence during the next succeeding years of the tremendous disasters of 1912 and 1913: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Natchez Chamber of Commerce, That the Congress of the United States in the exercise of its constitutional power and authority to provide for the general welfare to regulate commerce between the States should, as speedily as possible, enact a law providing for the taking over and maintenance by the Federal Government of the entire levee system from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, and for raising and strengthening the same, and for protecting the levees and the banks of the river from sloughing and caving by a complete and scientific system of revetments, spur dikes, and breakwaters, to the end that the floods of waters passing periodically through the channel of the lower Mississippi River may be kept within proper bounds; that the value and utility of the river as a medium of interstate commerce may be increased, and that the arable lands on either shore, which have been annually subjected to the menace of overflow and often to actual inundation, may be insured of adequate protection, and further providing for the appropriation of ample funds for accomplishing the ends desired.

Resolved further, That the levee system alone, as heretofore maintained, is insufficient for either the improvement of the navigation of the river or for the protection from overflow of the arable lands adjacent thereto; and that to achieve satisfactory results the levee system must be supplemented by revetments and spur dikes to prevent the banks of the river from caving and to control the direction of the current, and also by properly constructed and controlled outlets or spillways at suitable points to be determined by the engineers to assist in carrying to the Gulf the accumulated flood waters whenever the volume becomes greater than the discharging capacity of the natural mouth of the river.

Resolved further, That we oppose the divorcement of the Red River from the Mississippi, and respectfully urge Congress to enact proper and sufficient laws providing for the maintenance of a deep channel from the Mississippi River up to the mouth of the Red and thence down the Atchafalaya as the great natural outlet or spillway for waters of the Mississippi in times of excessive floods.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the States of Mississippi and Louisiana; and that they be, and are hereby, requested and urged to advocate with all their influence the enactment of laws for the accomplishment of the results and purposes set forth and recommended in the foregoing resolutions, and providing ample appropriations extending over a period of years so as to insure the ends desired.

Resolved further, That the Natchez Chamber of Commerce does expressly refrain from criticizing or indorsing either of the bills now pending before Congress for the regulation and control of the Mississippi River and for the improvement of the navigation thereof, believing that whichever bill may be finally adopted will be first materially amended, and recognizing the meritorious features of both, and having confidence that the patriotism, zeal, and ability of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Mississippi and Louisiana will insure that whichever bill may become a law shall have embodied in it the best possible provisions for our protection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 4.

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass necessary laws to enable riparian owners along the Mississippi River, in the counties of Warren, Claiborne, Jefferson, Adams, and Wilkinson, in the State of Mississippi, to secure compensation for the annual inundation and destruction for agricultural purposes of their lands, owing to the construction of Government works on the west bank of the Mississippi, and owing to the failure of Congress, after repeated efforts of said riparian owners, to grant any compensation or to adopt any adequate measure of relief although such compensation and such relief were strenuously recommended to Congress by the Mississippi River Commission.

Whereas there are in the county of Warren 21,000 acres of arable land capable of producing 15,000 bales of cotton annually; and in the county of Claiborne 10,000 acres of arable land, capable of producing 7,500 bales of cotton annually; and in the county of Jefferson 18,000 acres of arable land, capable of producing 13,000 bales of cotton annually; and in the county of Adams 12,000 acres of arable land, capable of producing 9,000 bales of cotton annually; and in the county of Wilkinson 9,000 acres of arable land, capable of producing 7,000 bales of cotton annually; and

Whereas these lands front upon the Mississippi River and unprotected by levees, and the United States Government has steadfastly refused to cooperate with the riparian owners in these counties in the erection of levees, but has instead adopted the hills in the rear of these properties as and for levees in the interest of navigation, thus placing the lands of these riparian owners in the channel of the river in the time of high water; and

Whereas these lands, until recent years, were capable of being thoroughly cultivated and utilized for agricultural purposes and were of considerable value to their respective owners and yielded large returns to the counties in which they were located, and to the State of Mississippi, by reason of their assessed valuation upon the tax rolls of said counties and State; and

Whereas the gradual elevation of the flood line and subsequent floods and high water have resulted in the buildings on said lands being floated off the property of said riparian owners, their fences being totally destroyed, their drainage ditches being filled up, their once splendid fields being covered with superinduced additions of earth, sand, gravel, and seeds of noxious weeds, and the assessed values of their respective properties reduced to a nominal figure by reason of the destruction of their productive capacity; and

Whereas this result is entirely due to the construction of levees by the Government on the western bank of the Mississippi River in the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, as well as to the nonerection of corresponding levees on the fronts of the lands of these riparians, which said facts are now admitted by the Mississippi River Commission in their report of June 30, 1910 (p. 2937), to wit: "* * * The elevation of the general flood level, which has resulted from the extension of the levee system in recent years, subjects these lands to deeper overflow than they were subject to formerly, or would be subject to now if the levee system were not in existence. * * * The people living in the larger of these overflowed areas have been clamoring for aid in the building of levees to protect their lands for 16 years past. * * * The immediate cause of the injuries complained of is the increased elevation of flood heights. That is the result of the general confinement of flood discharges by the levee system as a whole. * * * The situation is pathetic and distressing in the highest degree. That these people are to be condemned to perpetual inundation, without possibility of relief or redress, for the sake of an improvement for which their fellow citizens are enjoying great benefits, is intolerable to any man's sense of justice." The commission conclude their report from which the above extracts have been made by recommending to Congress three modes of compensation: One is to assist the owners of the inundated lands by helping them to build levees; another is to compensate them in damages for the injuries which they have sustained; a third is to buy their lands and devote them to forestry. (See Report Mississippi River Commission, 1910, p. 2937.)

Whereas under the law as it now exists said riparians are without legal redress against the Government of the United States, and Congress has refused to grant them aid in building of levees after an elaborate presentation has been given to the Sixty-second Congress in 1913: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That the Congress of the United States is memorialized and requested to pass Senate bill No. 1143, introduced in the Sixty-third Congress, April 7, 1913, "To confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and adjudicate claims for the taking of private property and damage thereto as the result of the improvement of the Mississippi River for navigation," to the end that the owners of said riparian lands in the counties of Warren, Claiborne, Jefferson, Adams, and Wilkinson may have a right of redress against the Government of the United States for the injuries which they may be able to prove that they have sustained by reason of the construction by the Government of the Mississippi River levee system, as so strenuously demonstrated by the Mississippi River Commission in their said report of June 30, 1910, on page 2937 of said report.

Resolved further, That the Members of Congress of the State of Mississippi are requested and urged to make special effort to carry into effect the purpose of this memorial.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

I, the undersigned clerk of the House of Representatives of the said State of Mississippi, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of house concurrent resolution No. 4, introduced in the house of representatives by the Hon. Bramlette, jr., representative from Wilkinson County, on June 10, 1913, and passed by the house on June 13, 1913, and sent to the senate under suspension of the rules at once, and passed by the senate on June 13, 1913, as shown by the journals of the said two houses, in extraordinary session assembled.

LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING BUREAU.

Mr. OWEN submitted a report (No. 73) to accompany the bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress, heretofore reported by him.

HOUSING COMMISSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) providing for a housing commission, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 74) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read for information by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a commission of five persons, three women and two men, who shall serve without compensation, to devise plans and the means of caring for and housing the indigent, improvident, and needy population of the District of Columbia, to be known as the housing commission.

It shall be the duty of said commission to ascertain and report to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress, with his own views thereon and any suggestions he may desire to make, the following:

First. A suitable location for a sufficient number of model sanitary houses for the accommodation of such persons as should be cared for under the direction of the National Government.

Second. The kind and probable cost of such suitable houses as may be needed for the proper housing and care of such persons.

Third. The best means of renting or otherwise providing such houses for persons able to make compensation therefor.

Fourth. The best and most practicable way of policing, superintending, and securing proper care and sanitation of such houses, and the grounds provided for their construction, and of improving the moral and sanitary conditions of the people so provided for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from California if this is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. WORKS. It is. It involves an investigation, and does not bind the Government to anything, and does not cost anything.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that it was recommended by the District Commissioners.

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I report back from the Committee on Public Lands favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 2548) to create an additional land district in the State of Arizona, and I submit a report (No. 75) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In the original bill certain counties were described. The department has by description of metes and bounds included the same territory. So the committee amendment is only a change in a description of the land, which includes the same territory that was described in the original bill.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "contained," to strike out "in the following-named counties, to wit, Pima, Santa Cruz, Cochise, Gila, Greenlee, and Graham" and to insert:

Beginning at the southeast corner of the State of Arizona; thence north along the boundary line between the States of Arizona and New Mexico to the southeast corner of township 5 north, range 31 east of the Gila and Salt River meridian; thence west along the township line to the southwest corner of township 5 north, range 28 east; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of township 8 north, range 27 east; thence west along the second standard parallel north to the southeast corner of township 9 north, range 25 east; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of said township; thence west along the township line to the southeast corner of township 10 north, range 21 east; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of said township; thence west along the township line to the southeast corner of township 11 north, range 18 east; thence north along the range line to the northeast corner of said township; thence west along the surveyed and unsurveyed township line to the southwest corner of township 12 north, range 16 east, when surveyed; thence north along the unsurveyed range line to the northwest corner of said township; thence west along the third standard parallel north to the northeast corner of township 12 north, range 10 east; thence south along the range line to the southeast corner of said township; thence west along the township line to the northwest corner of township 11½ north, range 11 east; thence south along the surveyed and unsurveyed range line, allowing for the proper offsets, to the southwest corner of township 2 north, range 11 east, when surveyed; thence east along the surveyed and unsurveyed township line to the northeast corner of township 1 north, range 15 east; thence south along the range line to the southeast corner of said township; thence east along the base line to the northeast corner of unsurveyed township 1 south, range 15 east; thence south along the surveyed and unsurveyed range line to the northwest corner of township 4 south, range 16 east; thence east along the township line to the northeast corner of township 4 north, range 17 east; thence south along the range line to the southeast corner of said township; thence east along the unsurveyed township line to the northeast corner of unsurveyed township 5 south, range 18 east; thence south along the surveyed and unsurveyed range line to the southeast corner of township 10 south, range 18 east; thence west along the second standard parallel south to the southeast corner of unsurveyed township 10 south, range 1 west; thence north along the Gila and Salt River principal meridian to the northeast corner of said township; thence west along the second standard parallel south to the northwest corner of township 10 south, range 10 west; thence south along the unsurveyed range line to its intersection with the south boundary of Arizona; thence southeasterly and easterly along said boundary to the southeast corner of the State of Arizona, the place of beginning.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISPOSITION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate resolution 122, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. OVERMAN June 26, 1913, as follows:

Resolved, That certain old documents and pamphlets now in the Senate folding room known as "surplus documents" and not credited to the account of any Senator shall be disposed of under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms as follows:

First. From a schedule thereof to be furnished by the Sergeant at Arms each Senator shall be entitled to select and distribute such of said documents and pamphlets as he may desire, the same to be taken from the Senate folding room within a period of six months from the date of the adoption of this resolution. At the expiration of that period of time the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to dispose of the residue of said documents to the several executive departments, bureaus, offices, and commissions of the Government which may desire the same, or to sell the same as waste paper, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury in the manner provided by law: Provided, That said surplus documents and pamphlets shall be subject to the order of Senators in the order in which applications therefor are filed with the Sergeant at Arms.

Second. That certain obsolete documents and pamphlets in the folding room, described in a schedule prepared under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms now to the credit of Senators and which are seldom drawn upon and for which there is little demand, be disposed of under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms as follows: At the expiration of eight months from the date of the adoption of this resolution such of the said documents and pamphlets as are not disposed of and taken from the folding room by the Senators to whom they are credited shall be disposed of by the Sergeant at Arms to the several executive departments, bureaus, offices, and commissions of the Government or be sold as waste paper, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury in the manner provided by law: Provided, That none of the documents and pamphlets provided to be disposed of by this resolution shall be hereafter returned to the Senate folding room from any source.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, beginning in line 11, after the word "resolution" and the period, strike out the text of the resolution down to and including line 4 on page 2 and in lieu of the matter stricken out insert:

Second. At the expiration of six months the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to furnish a list of the residue of said surplus documents to the several executive departments and independent establishments of the Government and to supply their requests for such documents in the order in which application shall be made for a period of 30 days after said list shall have been furnished. At the expiration of the last-named period the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to sell as waste paper all of said surplus documents then remaining in the folding room, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury in the manner provided by law: Provided, That in case a number of Senators file within 30 days after said schedule is furnished them for a particular document in excess of the number on hand, then they shall be apportioned pro rata among the Senators filing such orders.

Mr. OVERMAN. What change does that make in my original resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. The original resolution had these words:

At the expiration of that period of time the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to dispose of the residue of said documents to the several executive departments, bureaus, offices, and commissions of the Government which may desire the same, or to sell the same as waste paper, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury in the manner provided by law.

The amendment provides that a certain length of time shall be given to the departments to select what they want, and then, after they have selected whatever they desire, such documents as remain shall be disposed of as stated. In other words, it follows the wording of the law that we now have in disposing of surplus documents in the Government Printing Office itself. The resolution applies to the folding room of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, to strike out the first word in the paragraph, the word "Second," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Resolved further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, lines 6 and 7, to strike out the words "prepared under the direction of" and in lieu thereof to insert "to be furnished by."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 11, before the word "months," to strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "six."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 13, to strike out the first three words in the line, the words "disposed of and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 15, after the words "Sergeant at Arms," to strike out the remainder of the line, all of lines 16 and 17, and line 18 down to and including the word "law," and to insert in lieu thereof as follows:

First. At the expiration of six months the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to furnish a list of the residue of said obsolete documents and pamphlets to each Senator, and to supply their requests therefor in the manner hereinbefore provided for the distribution of surplus documents for a period of 60 days.

Second. At the expiration of the last-named period the remainder of said obsolete documents and pamphlets shall be disposed of as hereinbefore provided for surplus documents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 19, before the word "documents," to insert the words "surplus or obsolete."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is substantially my resolution. There are a few minor changes. I hope the resolution will be adopted as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That certain old documents and pamphlets now in the Senate folding room known as "surplus documents" and not credited to the account of any Senator shall be disposed of under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms, as follows:

First. From a schedule thereof to be furnished by the Sergeant at Arms each Senator shall be entitled to select and distribute such of said documents and pamphlets as he may desire, the same to be taken from the Senate folding room within a period of six months from the date of the adoption of this resolution.

Second. At the expiration of six months the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to furnish a list of the residue of said surplus documents to the several executive departments and independent establishments of the Government and to supply their requests for such documents in the order in which application shall be made for a period of 30 days after said list shall have been furnished. At the expiration of the last-named period the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to sell as waste paper all of said surplus documents then remaining in the folding room, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury in the manner provided by law: Provided, That in case a number of Senators file within 30 days after said schedule is furnished them for a particular document in excess of the number on hand, then they shall be apportioned pro rata among the Senators filing such orders.

Resolved further, That certain obsolete documents and pamphlets in the folding room, described in a schedule to be furnished by the Sergeant at Arms, now to the credit of Senators and which are seldom drawn upon and for which there is little demand, be disposed of under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms, as follows: At the expiration of six months from the date of the adoption of this resolution such of the said documents and pamphlets as are not taken from the folding room by the Senators to whom they are credited shall be disposed of by the Sergeant at Arms as follows:

First. At the expiration of six months the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized to furnish a list of the residue of said obsolete documents and pamphlets to each Senator and to supply their requests therefor in the manner hereinbefore provided for the distribution of surplus documents for a period of 60 days.

Second. At the expiration of the last-named period the remainder of said obsolete documents and pamphlets shall be disposed of as hereinbefore provided for surplus documents: Provided, That none of the surplus or obsolete documents and pamphlets provided to be disposed of by this resolution shall be hereafter returned to the Senate folding room from any source.

STATUE OF ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back with an amendment Senate concurrent resolution No. 5, providing for the printing and binding of the proceedings attending the unveiling and acceptance of the statue of Zachariah Chandler, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear some explanation as to why that request should be made. What peculiar reason is there for it?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that it is the usual form of such resolutions. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] gave notice that at 3 o'clock on July 28, 1913, he would call up Senate resolution 119 and address the Senate relative to the public service of Zachariah Chandler in connection with the presentation of the statue, which, of course, will be placed in Statuary Hall.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The statue is already in position.

Mr. SMOOT. I am informed that it is already in the hall. This is simply such a resolution as we always pass authorizing the proceedings at the unveiling and acceptance of the statue to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is the man who held the Tilden-Hayes campaign decision with a mailed fist, is he not?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not in a position to decide that question; it cuts no figure here. This is a resolution similar to those we always pass in such cases.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Zachariah Chandler, presented by the State of Michigan, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Michigan.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 2, after the word "bound," to insert the words "with illustrations."

Mr. WILLIAMS. What are the illustrations?

Mr. SMOOT. There is simply one illustration in all public documents of this character, and that is a cut of the person in whose honor the services are held.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, instead of "illustrations," it ought to be "illustration."

Mr. SMOOT. I simply used the word which has been in other similar resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing that shall be done. I simply wanted to know what it was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CONTINUOUS RESIDENCE UNDER HOMESTEAD LAWS.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 1350) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to designate certain tracts of land in the State of Nevada upon which continuous residence shall not be required under the homestead laws, and I submit a report (No. 76) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by him from the Committee on Public Lands. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have the bill read.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Lands were, on page 1, line 4, after the words "in the," to strike out "State of Nevada" and insert "States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming"; in line 10, before the word "million," to strike out "two" and insert "one"; in line 11, after the word "acres," to insert "in each State"; on page 2, line 1, after the word "than," to strike out "one-eighth" and insert "one-sixteenth"; in line 2, before the word "during," to strike out "one-fourth" and insert "one-eighth"; and in line 3, before the word "during," to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fourth," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any tracts of land in the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming, subject to entry under the act to provide for an enlarged homestead, approved February 19, 1909, do not have upon them a sufficient supply of water suitable for domestic purposes as would make continuous residence upon the lands possible, he may, in his discretion, designate such tracts of land, not to exceed in the aggregate 1,000,000 acres in each State, and thereafter they shall be subject to entry under this act without the necessity of residence: Provided, That in such event the entryman on any such entry shall in good faith cultivate not less than one-sixteenth of the entire area of the entry during the second year, one-eighth during the third year, and one-fourth during the fourth and fifth years after the date of such entry, and that after entry and until final proof the entryman shall reside within such distance of said land as will enable him to successfully farm the same.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada if this bill is not practically a repetition of the enlarged homestead act?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will answer the Senator from Washington by stating that this bill is identical with section 6 of that act, which only applied to the State of Nevada; but the bill proposes to extend that act so as to apply to the other Western States named in the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to designate certain tracts of land in the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming upon which continuous residence shall not be required under the homestead laws."

ALLEGED SECRET HEARING OF SENATE COMMITTEE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I read from page 2342 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amend by inserting, after the word "Congress," in line 9, page 3, the following:

"'All meetings of said committee or any subcommittee, excepting only executive sessions, shall be open to the public.'"

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I withdrew that amendment, and moved to amend by striking out the word "executive" and inserting "all meetings for the hearing of witnesses or the taking of testimony by any committee or subcommittee shall be open to the public."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Meetings are very often held in which neither testimony is taken nor witnesses heard, but they are held for the purpose of hearing arguments. Does the gentleman want those to be private? Does he not want all to be public except executive sessions? It occurs to me that the first amendment offered by the gentleman covers the case, and that is the practice, so far as I am aware, which has been followed by all committees. In those upon which I have served, at least, the taking of testimony and the hearing of arguments have all been public, so far as I have any knowledge of what has happened, and I have served on a good many committees that have taken a good deal of testimony.

Mr. COOPER. I have known of hearings before State legislatures——

Mr. BARTLETT. But I am speaking about this Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. At a meeting of a Senate committee yesterday there was a secret hearing.

I want to say, Mr. President, that if Mr. MURDOCK was referring to the "lobby committee"—and I suppose it was to that committee he was referring—I know not what the source of his information was. I know of no meeting of a Senate committee on yesterday except that of the committee known as the "lobby committee." As I have said, I do not know from what source the gentleman derived his information, but there is not one solitary word of truth in his statement. The Senate "lobby committee" has been holding open hearings—hearings open to all the public. We have never had one single, solitary secret meeting. We have had, I believe, three executive sessions, purely upon questions of the admissibility of testimony. The first executive meeting we held was in reference to a protest upon the part of Mr. Oxnard, represented by his counsel, that his letters should not be read into the hearings. We retired and discussed the question of law, and decided that they should be read. To-day we had an executive session to decide the question whether or not certain letters addressed to Senators of the United States by Mr. William Whitman in 1897 should be read in evidence. The witness upon the stand, Mr. Whitman, protested against their introduction. We decided that they should be read in evidence.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And you did right.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we did right. We had another executive session, I believe, in reference to the gentleman known as Mr. Lamar. Before answering a question that was put to him he said he would like to consult with the committee confidentially, as he thought when we heard him that we would not press the question. The executive session was held purely upon that question, not affecting the lobby investigation but affecting domestic matters; and we declined to press the question. Yet we are charged by a Member of the other House with holding secret hearings.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are comments of this kind in the Senate upon proceedings in the House of Representatives in order?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Washington, I suppose, objects to my proceeding?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to understand what the rule of the Senate is in that regard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule of the Senate upon the question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think that ordinarily——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to inquire further, if it is in order, under the rules of the Senate, to comment upon proceedings in the House of Representatives and to make charges against Members of that House for their action as Members?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The inquiry, as the Chair understands, is put to the Chair and not to the Senator from North Carolina. The Chair will state that it is the opinion of the Chair that as a self-governing body it is for the Senate to determine how far its Members may go in commenting upon language used in any other body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the inquiry in order that there may be some clear understanding upon the subject. It seems to be in doubt. I understand, then, that there is no rule and no restriction as to comments here upon proceedings in the House of Representatives.

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to the Senator, I will say that since I have been a Member of the Senate ordinarily out of courtesy it is not in order to refer to the Members of the other House, but in this instance a Member of the House has referred to the Senate. I know Mr. MURDOCK; he is a high-toned gentleman; and a man who would not make a misstatement if he knew it. I said at the outset that I did not know from what source he received his information. I take it for granted that he has been misinformed. The only point I make is that when a Member of another body makes an allegation against a Member of this body a Member of this body has a right to rise in his seat and refer to the statement made in another body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me perfectly obvious that this proceeding is objectionable for many reasons, even if not contrary to the rules of the Senate. The gentleman to whom the Senator has referred is not present, and can not be present, and if he were present he would not have an opportunity to reply. I did not hear distinctly the portion of the RECORD which the Senator read, but, so far as I heard it, there was no reference to the Senate; there was no reference to any committee of the Senate; and it is a mere inference that the Senator is drawing from what was said there. I have never heard the remark before.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator surely did not hear what I read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have said that I may not have heard it distinctly.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was said "At a meeting of a Senate committee."

The Senate was not present to hear that statement made, and where is the Senate to defend itself unless it does so upon the floor of the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that the House of Representatives is fully capable of enforcing proper rules in that body and to put a stop to any objectionable comments upon the coordinate branch of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, if the Senator thinks the Speaker of the House ought to have called Mr. MURDOCK to order, he did not do so, and unless the matter is referred to here we are without any defense.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think, Mr. President, either the Speaker of the House or some other Member of the House, if there was any breach of propriety, ought to have raised the question there.

Mr. OVERMAN. If some Member of the Senate should make an attack upon the Senator from Washington, he not being present, would the Senator think he had no right to defend himself upon the floor of the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is an entirely different question. Undoubtedly if a Member of the Senate should make an attack upon another Senator, that Senator would have the right to reply.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean if a Member of the House should attack a Member of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point of order is that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is proceeding with a discussion. The Senator from Washington has not made, as I understand, a point of order against the propriety of that discussion, and until he does so the colloquy between the Senator from Washington and the Senator from North Carolina is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order of the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from North Carolina had the floor and that he yielded the floor to me, and I do not understand that it is necessary for me, in order to be in order, to adapt my remarks to suit the approval of the Senator from Iowa. There is no rule as to what a Senator's remarks shall be or what they shall not be, so far as the approval of other Senators is concerned; but, inasmuch as the Senator has raised the question, I will, in order to get a ruling upon it, make the point of order that the criticisms and comments of the Senator from North Carolina upon the proceedings in the House of Representatives are out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call on the Senator from Washington to state the rule under which they are out of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will wait, Mr. President, until the Senator from Washington finds that rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit the question to the Chair. I will submit the rule a little later, if the Chair will give me permission to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that, in fairness to the Chair, the Senator from Washington should call the Chair's attention to the rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will undertake to do so, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. In the meantime the Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I was just about finishing when the Senator from Washington rose, and I had a curiosity to know what the Senator had to say about this matter. The statement I have read is a reflection upon the Senate, and I, as chairman of the committee, felt it my duty to rise and correct it. I want to repeat that I know Mr. MURDOCK, and know him to be an honorable gentleman, who would not make a misstatement if he knew it; but the source of his information is incorrect. The Senate "lobby committee" has not had any secret hearings, and does not propose to have any secret hearings. They have had three executive sessions on the question of the admissibility of evidence.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator consider it a reflection upon the Senate to say that its proceedings, or a part of its proceedings, are conducted in secret session?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not exactly a reflection, but I myself believe in open hearings, and inasmuch as we have been having open hearings, I did not want to have stated in another body that which was not true.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 598) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend sections 2291 and 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads," and I submit a report (No. 77) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. The amendments of the Committee on Public Lands were, on page 2, line 6, after the word "required," to strike out "but the Secretary of the Interior may, upon a satisfactory showing, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, reduce the required area of cultivation," and in line 19, after the word "the," to strike out the words "foregoing provisions" and insert "above provision," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions pertaining to cultivation by entrymen of homestead lands as set forth in the section of the act approved June 6, 1912, entitled "An act to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads," be amended to read as follows:

"Provided further, That the entryman shall, in order to comply with the requirements of cultivation herein provided for, cultivate not less than one-sixteenth of the area of his entry, beginning with the second year of the entry, and not less than one-eighth, beginning with the third year of the entry, and until final proof, except that in the case of entries under section 6 of the enlarged-homestead law double the area of cultivation herein provided shall be required: Provided, That the entryman in lieu of cultivation required herein may make improvements upon his entry by constructing fences or buildings, by slashing, clearing, or in other ways preparing the land for cultivation, by planting orchard, or by otherwise making the homestead habitable or capable of production, said improvements to aggregate an amount each year of not less than $1.50 per acre, except that in cases of entries under section 6 of the enlarged-homestead law the amount of improvements shall be not less than 75 cents per acre: Provided, That the above provision as to cultivation shall not apply to entries under the act of April 28, 1904, commonly known as the Kinkaid Act, or entries under the act of June 17, 1902, commonly known as the reclamation act, and that the provisions of this section relative to the homestead period shall apply to all unperfected entries as well as entries hereafter made upon which residence is required."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I understand there is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is a report from the Committee on Public Lands to the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. This seems to be a pretty important matter. I do not want to object to the report of the committee, because I should have been present at the committee meeting, but was prevented.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, with his permission, that the only change the bill makes in the present law is that in lieu of the cultivation of a sixteenth of the homestead the second year and an eighth the third year the homesteader is authorized to expend a dollar and a half per acre, so that it gives to him the option either to make improvements on the homestead at the rate of one dollar and a half per acre per annum or to cultivate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It affects the entry in no other way?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the only change made in the law. The bill is one that was introduced some time ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to relieve the hardship upon the present homesteaders.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what the bill as reported provides in lieu of that part of the present law which allows the Secretary of the Interior to make provision with reference to cultivation other than that specifically covered by law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee thought those words in the law were useless and they were stricken out, so that the homesteader can either make improvements the second and third year as provided by the present law or make improvements as provided by the proposed amendment.

Mr. JONES. The bill provides specific improvements in place of the discretion now given to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN RAILWAY COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I file a report (No. 72) to accompany the bill (S. 2517) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees. There is quite a demand for this report, and I ask unanimous consent that a thousand copies of it be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Nevada if the committee has already ordered any copies of the report printed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No. As I understand, the usual course is to print 250 copies of a report. I ask that a thousand copies of this one be printed, because the Senator will understand that there is a great demand for this report, in view of the pending contentions between the railroads and their employees.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever to printing the thousand copies; but I wish to say to the Senator that under the law the committee over which he presides has a perfect right to order a thousand copies, and there is no necessity to have an order of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If that is the case, I will call the committee together for that purpose.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

BUREAU OF MINES, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Mr. WALSH. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 2689) amending an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, inasmuch as it is my purpose to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill when a report is made, I trust the Senate will bear with me while I make a brief statement of the nature of the bill.

On the 4th of March, 1913, the general public buildings bill was passed, including a provision for the erection and construction of certain buildings to be used by the Bureau of Mines in the city of Pittsburgh, State of Pennsylvania, upon lands acquired by exchange of lands owned by the Government of the United States with the city of Pittsburgh. Through the lands thus acquired is a deep ravine. Other interests in the neighborhood, jointly with the State of Pennsylvania, have signified a willingness to contribute to the Government a considerable sum of money, about $500,000, for the purpose of filling this ravine, and also for the acquisition of an additional tract of ground amounting to about an acre and a quarter. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to accept any donations that may be made for improving the grounds for the purpose to which they have been devoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE TARIFF.

TOBACCO STATISTICS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 127), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement showing in tabulated form for the calendar year 1912 the names and addresses of the 10 largest manufacturers of tobacco, whether smoking, plug, twist, or fine cut, and the number of pounds manufactured by each during the calendar year 1912, and the amount of internal-revenue tax paid by each for the 12 calendar months of 1912; also the total number of pounds of tobacco manufactured by all manufacturers during the same period and the total internal-revenue tax paid thereon.

Second. Mr. NORRIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 128), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be instructed to investigate, if it has not the information now in hand, and report to the Senate all the facts and circumstances connected with the proposed issue by the New York Central & Hudson River Railway of 4 per cent mortgage bonds for $167,102,400, for the purpose of taking up outstanding 3½ per cent bonds now existing against said railroad and the stock of the Lake Shore and Michigan Central Railways.

That the commission be instructed to furnish the Senate with the date and amount of all said 3½ per cent mortgage bonds, the reason for their issue, when they mature, whether the issuing of the said 4 per cent bonds for the said 3½ per cent bonds will not be an unwarranted and illegal capitalization of said railroads, whether the proposed consolidation of said railroads involved in the said proposed issue of 4 per cent bonds would not be unwarranted and unlawful, and whether the increase of the rate of interest thus proposed by the issuing of said 4 per cent bonds is necessary, even though the consolidation of said railroads is unobjectionable.

THOMAS GREEN PEYTON.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 52) to authorize the appointment of Thomas Green Peyton as a cadet in the United States Military Academy. The joint resolution is very short, and I think it will not detain the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution he has indicated. It will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not had a chance to read the report or to ascertain why the joint resolution should pass. What is the occasion for it? Perhaps the Senator can state it in a few words.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. This young man had been at West Point for two years and a half. Shortly after going there he was operated on for appendicitis, and suffered to some extent from that, and got behind a little. He was dismissed for demerits, but the superintendent says they were insignificant and in matters that did not at all affect his honor. The Secretary of War approves the bill as a proper one.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know what the breaches of academy discipline were?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The superintendent of the academy says they were very small infractions, such as not folding his blankets properly, and similar little things that did not affect in the slightest his honor, his integrity, or his morality.

Mr. SMOOT. He simply failed, then, on account of demerits?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Solely on account of demerits.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He was not a good enough housekeeper; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of War to appoint Thomas Green Peyton a cadet in the United States Military Academy.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATERWAYS OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration Senate resolution 32, Order of Business 21 on the calendar, reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested to enter upon negotiations with Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada with a view to an international agreement for the concurrent or cooperative improvement of navigation in waterways used, or which can be used, in common for the commerce of Canada and the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have some explanation from the Senator who has called up the resolution as to its scope. Does it include the Panama Canal?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It includes simply in its terms waterways used, or which can be used, in common for the commerce of Canada and the United States. That involves the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River, the Columbia River, and those international streams which can not properly or readily be improved by either country alone, but the improvement of which can better be accomplished by the joint action of the two countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that the resolution ought to be amended so as to confine its terms to that subject. It is not so limited now. Any navigable water can be used in common between the United States and Canada.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it will suit the Senator from Washington better, it may be made to read "for the concurrent or cooperative improvement of navigation in boundary waterways used, or which can be used, in common" and so forth. Those are the only waterways that would be improved by joint action.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that would be much better.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will offer that amendment, I shall not object to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In line 5, before the word "waterways," I move to insert the word "boundary," so as to read:

With a view to an international agreement for the concurrent or cooperative improvement of navigation in boundary waterways used—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business having closed, that is now the order.

Mr. ASHURST. Very will.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first bill on the calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 922) providing——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask whether the motion of the Senator from Arizona was put?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business in order is to take up unobjected bills and resolutions on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I wanted the Senate to do.

MARSHAL FOR DISTRICT OF NEVADA.

The bill (S. 922) providing for an increase of salary of the United States marshal for the district of Nevada was announced as first in order on the calendar, and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration. Charles W. Castle, paymaster, the sum of $7,181.64.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO SENATORS.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 19, to authorize the allowance of an additional clerk to Senators having less than three.

Mr. KERN. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will be passed over.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Senate resolution 65, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to report to the Senate certain information relative to employees in the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 540) for the relief of Joseph Hodges was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM O. MALLAHAN.

The bill (S. 653) for the relief of William O. Mallahan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William O. Mallahan, who was a private in Company A, Eighteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been mustered in as a member of said company or regiment on May 12, 1862, and honorably discharged therefrom on July 20, 1865. The printed form of such notice shall be furnished by the inspectors authorized by this act. Any employer who fails to keep such record as required by this section, or makes any false statement therein, or refuses to exhibit such time book or record, or makes any false statement to an official authorized to enforce this act in reply to any question put in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be liable for a violation thereof.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint three inspectors, two of whom shall be women, to carry out the purposes of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 each per annum.

SEC. 7. That the inspectors authorized by this act may in the discharge of their duties enter any place, building, or room where any labor is being performed by females which is affected by the provisions of this chapter whenever such inspectors may have reasonable cause to believe that any such labor is being performed therein.

SEC. 8. They shall make a daily report to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and also report any cases of illegal employment contrary to the provisions of this act to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia.

ARID PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The bill (S. 487) providing for the discovery, development, and protection of streams, springs, and water holes in the desert and arid public lands of the United States in the State of California, for rendering the same more readily accessible, and for the establishment of and maintenance of signboards and monuments locating the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that that bill go over. I object to its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill goes over.

Mr. WORKS subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that during my absence from the Chamber Senate bill 487 was called, and objection was made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH]. That Senator desires an amendment to be made by striking out the word "streams" wherever it occurs. The Senator has the bill before him. I should be very glad to have him offer the amendment; and with that amendment, I understand, he withdraws his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate will return to the consideration of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Interior Department be, and is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed immediately to proceed by all necessary and proper means to discover, develop, protect, and render more accessible, for the benefit of the general public, springs, streams, and water holes on what are known as the western deserts and arid public lands of the United States in the State of California; and in connection therewith to erect and maintain suitable and durable monuments and signboards at proper places and intervals along and near the accustomed lines of travel and over the general area of said desert lands, containing information and directions as to the location and nature of said springs, streams, and water holes, to the end that the same may be more readily traced and found by persons in search or need thereof; also to provide convenient and ready means, apparatus, and appliances by which water may be brought to the earth's surface at said water holes for the use of such persons; also to prepare and distribute suitable maps, reports, and general information relating to said springs, streams, and water holes, and their specific location with reference to lines of travel.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to make, issue, promulgate, and enforce such rules and regulations as may be necessary, or by him deemed expedient, to carry into force and effect the provisions of this act and accomplish its objects and purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendments which I propose is to strike out the word "streams" in line 7 of the first page, the word "streams" in line 5 of the second page, the word "streams" in line 12 of the second page, and the word "streams" in line 23 of the second page. I move that the amendments be made.

Mr. WORKS. I have no objection to those words being stricken out.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States in the State of Oregon which have been withdrawn or classified as oil lands, or are valuable for oil, shall be subject to appropriate entry under the homestead laws and the desert-land law by actual settlers only, to selection by the State of Oregon under grants made by Congress and under section 4 of the act approved August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, and to withdrawal under the act approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and to disposition, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under the law providing for the sale of isolated or disconnected tracts of public lands whenever such entry, selection, or withdrawal shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the oil and gas in such lands and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. But no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres: Provided, That those who have initiated nonmineral entries, selections, or locations in good faith prior to the passage of this act, on lands withdrawn or classified as oil lands, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which said entries were made, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act.

SEC. 2. That any person desiring to make entry under the homestead laws or the desert-land law, and the State of Oregon desiring to make selection under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, or under grants made by Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior in withdrawing under the reclamation act lands classified as oil lands, or valuable for oil, with a view of securing or passing title to the same in accordance with the provisions of said acts, shall state in the application for entry, selection, or notice of withdrawal that the same is made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

SEC. 3. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which entry is made and of this act the entryman shall be entitled to a patent to the land entered by him, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the oil and gas in the lands so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same upon rendering compensation to the patentee for all damages that may be caused by prospecting for and removing such oil and gas. The reserved oil and gas deposits in such lands shall be disposed of only as shall be hereafter expressly directed by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Emigration Canon Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Utah, is hereby granted permission, in so far as the United States is concerned, to occupy, for a right of way for its railroad track, that piece of land now included in the Mount Olivet Cemetery, Salt Lake County, Utah, particularly bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point 169 feet east and 100 feet north of the southwest corner of the Mount Olivet Cemetery (formerly the southwest corner of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation), in Salt Lake County, Utah; thence northwesterly, rounding a 20° curve a distance of 351$\frac{55}{100}$ feet, at a point on the west line of the said Mount Olivet Cemetery, a distance of 387$\frac{7}{10}$ feet north from the southwest corner of said Mount Olivet Cemetery; thence south to a point 100 feet north of the southwest corner of said Mount Olivet Cemetery; thence east a distance of 169 feet to place of beginning; containing in all seven hundred and sixty-two thousandths acre.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. OWEN subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to withdraw the objection which I made to the consideration of Senate bill 60, providing for agricultural entry of oil lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senate will return to the consideration of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States in the State of Wyoming which have been withdrawn or classified as oil lands or are valuable for oil shall be subject to appropriate entry under the homestead laws by actual settlers only, the desert-land law, to selection by the State of Wyoming under grants made by Congress and under section 4 of the act approved August 18, 1894, known as the Carey Act, and to withdrawal under the act approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and to disposition in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior under the law providing for the sale of isolated or disconnected tracts of public lands whenever such entry, selection, or withdrawal shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title, with a reservation to the United States of the oil and gas in such lands and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. But no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres: Provided, That those who have initiated nonmineral entries, selections, or locations in good faith prior to the passage of this act on lands withdrawn or classified as oil lands may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which said entries were made, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act.

SEC. 3. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which entry, selection, or location is made and of this act the applicant shall be entitled to a patent or certification to the lands entered or selected, with a reservation to the United States of all the oil or gas in the lands so patented or certified, together with the right in the United States or persons authorized by it to prospect for, mine, and remove the same; but before any person shall be entitled to enter upon the lands patented or certified for the purpose of prospecting, mining, or removing oil or gas therefrom he shall furnish, subject to approval by the Secretary of the Interior, a bond or undertaking as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on said lands by reason of such prospecting for and removal of oil or gas. The reserved oil and gas deposits in lands patented or certified under this act shall not be subject to exploration or entry other than by the United States, except as hereafter authorized by Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS IN OREGON.

The bill (S. 49) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was in section 1, page 1, line 8, after the word "maintained," to strike out "as a forest, for the demonstration of practical and technical forestry in the furtherance of the courses in forestry conducted, or to be conducted, by the State School of Forestry," and in lieu thereof to insert "as a State forest to secure its highest permanent usefulness to the State of Oregon and particularly to the common schools to which its resources are devoted and to State forestry demonstration and education," so as to make the section read:

That the State of Oregon is hereby authorized to select, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, a compact body of not to exceed 40,000 acres of unappropriated nonmineral land within townships 10 and 11 south, ranges 5 and 6 east, Willamette meridian, in the Santiam National Forest, Oreg., to be maintained as a State forest to secure its highest permanent usefulness to the State of Oregon and particularly to the common schools to which its resources are devoted and to State forestry demonstration and education, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to grant and convey said selection to the State of Oregon for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 14, after the word "rights," to insert "within such national forests," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in exchange for the selected lands the State shall reconvey and relinquish to the United States a good and sufficient title to an approximately equal area of unencumbered sections 16 and 36, or parts thereof, of substantial forest values satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, within the national forests of Oregon, granted to said State, or indemnity rights within such national forests to which the State is entitled therefor: Provided, That the lands reconveyed and relinquished as base lands shall immediately become parts of the national forest in which they are situated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 21, after the word "operation," to strike out "or" and insert "of"; and, in line 23, after the word "areas," to strike out "but no such roads, trails, or telephone or telegraph line shall hereafter be so located as to interfere with reasonable use of lands by the State," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the lands conveyed to the State shall be at all times subject to use by the United States for the construction, maintenance, and operation of roads, trails, telephone or telegraph lines needed in the administration of the contiguous national forest areas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD L. KEYES.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 100, which had been reported by Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, June 5, 1913, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, or a subcommittee thereof, is hereby directed to send for Edward L. Keyes, who was formerly a second lieutenant of the Fifth United States Cavalry, and to afford him a full hearing. Furthermore, the said committee, or subcommittee, is authorized to send for witnesses and take testimony, if such a course should be deemed desirable, with a view of determining whether or not a bill should be reported to the Senate by the Committee on Military Affairs transferring said Edward L. Keyes to the retired list of the Army, and if so, with what rank.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not see here either the Senator who reported the resolution from the committee or the Senator who introduced it. I should like to have some information about the matter. It occurs to me that the Committee on Military Affairs has that authority without the adoption of any resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I do not object to it, but I should like some information, if anyone can give it. If there is no one here who can give me the information, I will suggest that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President, until we can have some information in regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

The resolution (S. Res. 97) authorizing the Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, to hold hearings, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas] introduced that resolution. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate added an amendment in which he does not concur. Inasmuch as he is not present to-day, I think the resolution had better go over until he has an opportunity to be present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

WASHINGTON-OREGON CORPORATION.

The bill (S. 821) authorizing the Secretary of War to relieve the Washington-Oregon Corporation, as far as he may deem advisable in the public interests, from certain conditions in an act entitled "An act granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved August 9, 1912, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: Mr. President, referring to the bill just laid aside upon the objection of the Senator from Indiana, I understand he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KERN. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the senior Senator from Washington the purposes of this bill and the need for relieving this corporation from the conditions of the former act.

Mr. JONES. The railroad is to be built through the military reservation for the purpose of accommodating a large settlement to the east of the reservation. With the condition imposed in the act the road will not be built. The commercial club and the city council have asked for a positive modification of that provision by legislation. As the Senator will observe, the bill leaves to the discretion of the Secretary of War the question whether there shall be any modification at all, it being assumed by me when I introduced the bill that he would require a showing to be made as to the actual necessity of making a modification; and if he does not consider that any modification should be made in the interest of the public, he is not required to do it.

My understanding of the situation there is that the road will not be built if the condition that was imposed in previous legislation is insisted upon; and the people are very anxious, largely for their accommodation, that it shall be built.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I do not understand is the particular condition from which the railroad company needs relief.

Mr. JONES. It is the condition as to macadamizing the entire width of the street and certain rolling that they must do, and all that sort of thing. In other words, the people there think the street can be put in good condition and maintained in good condition without actually macadamizing it, as required by the act. I do not know whether that can be done or not, and therefore I did not want to direct the Secretary of War to do it without a showing being made to him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know that I shall object to the bill later. I am not familiar with the requirements. Therefore, in order to have an opportunity to confer with my colleague, I should like to have it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

JOSEPH L. DONOVAN.

The bill (S. 1808) for the relief of Joseph L. Donovan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Joseph L. Donovan, late a captain in the Twenty-second Infantry, United States Army, a major of Infantry in the Army of the United States, and provides that when so appointed he shall be placed on the retired list of the officers of the Army.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, to strike out "major" and insert "captain."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION.

The bill (S. 2005) to provide for participation by the Government of the United States in the National Conservation Exposition to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LEA. I ask that that bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was announced as next in order.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that at the conclusion of the call of the calendar I shall ask the Senate for a moment to consider a unanimous-consent agreement which I shall then propose with respect to the joint resolution.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 48) to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the bill be taken up for consideration notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BURTON. I understand that under this order of business only unobjected bills can be considered. The Chair certainly so announced at the beginning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think I can make that motion up to 4 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. NELSON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate. I wish to have this statement stand for the afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON. My colleague [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas] is absent from the city on important public business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent from the city on important business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is engaged on official business elsewhere, and that accounts for his absence at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered on the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived the motion is not in order under Rule VIII. However, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest that the matter was pending when the hour of 4 arrived, and that it is entitled to be considered at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The motion of the Senator from Alabama to go into executive session takes precedence.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not understand that he made that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 11, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, according to my recollection the remainder of the Journal simply relates to the passage of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII, and I think its reading can be dispensed with. I ask that the further reading of the Journal may be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with, and the Journal will stand approved as read.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THOMPSON presented petitions of Parsons Camp, No. 23, Sons of Veterans, of Parsons; of the Kansas Division, Sons of Veterans, of Independence; of members of the council of the twenty-ninth annual convention of the Woman's Relief Corps, Department of Kansas; and of Circle No. 2, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Parsons, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the amendment of legislation increasing pensions of widows of soldiers of the Civil War, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia presented a paper to accompany the bill (S. 2365) for the restoration of Alonzo Burke, chief carpenter, United States Navy, retired, to the active list of the Navy as an additional number in his grade, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 539) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 1133), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 78) thereon.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (S. 1349) admitting to citizenship and fully naturalizing George Edward Lerrigo, of the city of Topeka, in the State of Kansas, submitted an adverse report (No. 79) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Finance I report back with amendments House bill 3321, being a bill to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and with the recommendation that the bill do pass as amended. (S. Rept. 80.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina reports from the Committee on Finance the following bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that five days be allowed in which to file the report of the committee on the part of the majority and that five days thereafter be allowed the minority, or individual members of the minority, in which to file the views of the minority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the following order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina presents an order which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 additional copies of H. R. 3321, the tariff bill, as reported from the Committee on Finance, with an index of contents, be printed for the use of the Senate, 500 copies thereof to be printed on one side only for the special use of Senators.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to give notice, after conference with the minority members of the committee, in conjunction with the majority members, that on Wednesday next I will ask that House bill 3321 be made the unfinished business of the Senate, when I hope to submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can not hear the Senator from North Carolina on this side. Will he kindly speak a little louder?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me to repeat it, I have given notice that on Wednesday next I shall ask that House bill 3321, the tariff bill, be made the special order, and that the consideration of the bill shall be at once proceeded with.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Probably I will have to refer it to the Senator from North Carolina. He gives notice that he will ask that the bill be made a special order. What does that mean?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. STONE. The unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated the unfinished business at first. I was a little unfortunate if I spoke of it the last time as the special order. My first statement was that I should ask that it be made the unfinished business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have, and I shall have, no objection whatever to the tariff bill being the unfinished business. As I understand it, it can not become the unfinished business by agreement. It must become the unfinished business because it is taken up after the morning hour has expired and remains unfinished.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon of the Senator; I did not catch his last statement. I was interrupted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to get a clear idea of what the Senator from North Carolina proposes to do in the matter. I do not expect to oppose anything he may ask with regard to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean to say, Mr. President, that on next Wednesday I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill. That will make it the unfinished business. I did not state specifically the motion I would make. I simply said that I would ask that it be made the unfinished business. The formula for making the tariff bill the unfinished business will be, of course, a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand it now, Mr. President, and I am much obliged to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from North Carolina for a minute. At the time the bill was referred to the committee I suggested that more copies of it be printed, and the chairman of the committee suggested that I defer that suggestion until the bill was reported. If I understood the order proposed by the Senator correctly, it is for the printing of 5,000 copies.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would not the Senator be willing to amend that by providing for a larger number? I have a great demand for copies of the bill. There is a great demand in my State for accurate information as to what the committee has recommended. I should like personally to have as many copies as I can get to send to my constituents.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that there have already been printed 1,000 copies. The committee had no authority to authorize the printing of more than 1,000. It is necessary to get a special order for more copies. That with the present order will make 6,000. The committee seemed to think that that would be sufficient. More can be printed at any time when it becomes necessary to have additional copies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I do not wish in any way to suggest anything that is disagreeable to the Senator, but the 1,000 copies which have been printed are, I assume, pretty nearly exhausted now. The order presented to-day calls for 5,000 copies, which will be about 50 copies to a Senator. I know that I have demands for many more than that number of copies. Would the Senator object to printing 10,000 copies now?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think one difficulty is the requirement that the cost shall not exceed $500, and it would require a concurrent resolution if we go beyond 5,000 copies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is an order which the Senator now proposes, I understand. It is an order to be adopted by the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would be competent for the Senate, I assume, to order 10,000 copies as well as 5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be to the amount of $500, but if it would cost more than $500, then we must have a concurrent resolution. I doubt very much whether, under the $500 limit, we could print the 10,000 copies asked for by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of that explanation, I will defer further remark upon it until we can see if we can not get up a concurrent resolution to accomplish the result.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, due to the fact that I must be absent for a short time after next Monday, I desire to give notice at this time that immediately after the close of the morning business on next Monday I shall submit some remarks on the agricultural schedule of the tariff bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I inquire whether the order for printing 5,000 copies was adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet. The question is on agreeing to the order submitted by the Senator from North Carolina that 5,000 additional copies of the tariff bill as reported be printed.

The order was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 2727) to create an additional land district in the State of Nevada; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 2728) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 2729) granting an increase of pension to Gilman H. Dimond; and

A bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to Daniel W. Eaton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 2731) for the relief of William E. Dougherty;

A bill (S. 2732) for the relief of the estate of William C. Hemphill and others;

A bill (S. 2733) for the relief of John W. Whitten; and

A bill (S. 2734) for the relief of the estate of Richard H. Pond, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 2735) granting a pension to Cremora J. Huffman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 2736) granting an increase of pension to James L. Denham (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2737) granting an increase of pension to William Jackson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to Julius C. Ward (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) directing the Secretary of the Interior to amend certain patents issued to homestead entrymen upon lands formerly covered by the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation and other lands in what is known as the St. Maries and St. Joe country, in the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXTERMINATION OF PREDATORY ANIMALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 131), which was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make an investigation and report a plan for the extermination of predatory animals infesting ranches and farms in certain parts of Texas, with an estimate of cost.

SEC. 2. That said plans shall be so devised as to supplement and strengthen the efforts now being made by the State of Texas in this direction, to the end that these animal pests may be entirely destroyed.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to request that the decision of the district court of Oregon forfeiting the grant of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. for noncompliance with the terms of the grant be printed as a public document. I do not like to ask that this be done without reference to the committee, and in order that it may examine the matter I will ask that the motion be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In reference to it and in order that Senators may know why I make the request, I will state that I have called the attention of the Senate a number of times to the attempt to sell these lands to so-called innocent purchasers, and the public generally are interested in knowing what lands are involved in the decision.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a comparison of the tariff rates of duty as they were reported in Senate Document No. 45, and that there be included in it the changes which have been made in the bill as reported to the Senate. (S. Doc. No. 127.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I also have prepared a comparison of the rates of duty between the Wilson bill and the tariff bill as now reported to the Senate. The information has been desired a great many times, and I ask that it be printed as a public document for the use of the Senate. (S. Doc. No. 128.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, four years ago, during the consideration of the tariff bill, we had a book giving certain statistical information in that form. Are we to have a similar book prepared by the committee at this time for our benefit as we proceed with the consideration of the tariff bill paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we have prepared a similar book, and it has been printed. It was printed, however, before the amendments to the bill were made by the Senate committee, and experts are now at work revising it so as to bring the publication up to date. As soon as the work is finished the committee will have printed in parallel columns the present law and the House bill as amended. There will be printed the same data to which the Senator refers as having been embraced in the comparative statement that we used in the consideration of the tariff bill of 1909, together with certain additional matters which we wish the book to contain for the information of Senators. That, I think, will be prepared and ready to be printed in the course of a few days.

REAR ADMIRAL ROBERT E. PEARY, UNITED STATES NAVY (S. DOC. NO. 126).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning a decoration of grand officer of the Legion of Honor conferred upon Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, United States Navy, retired, by the President of the French Republic.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, these papers are submitted to Congress with a view to its decision whether the Secretary of State may be authorized to deliver the decoration to Admiral Peary.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1913.

REPORT OF JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 125).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the seventh annual report of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia for the year ended June 30, 1913.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1913.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Senate resolution 19, reported by Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, on April 28, 1913, to authorize the allowance of an additional clerk to Senators having less than three was announced as first in order.

Mr. KERN. I ask that that resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the resolution goes over.

Senate resolution 65, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to report to the Senate certain information relative to employees in the Diplomatic and Consular Service of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 832) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "name of," to strike out the initial "J" and to insert the name "James," so as to make the clause read:

The name of James N. Culton, late of Company D, Third Regiment, and first lieutenant Company D, Seventh Regiment, Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 833) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have that bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to explain the object of the bill to the Senator from Colorado. These three pension bills were passed by the Senate, and also by the other House, at the last session of Congress, but failed to get to the President in time for him to sign them. They are the same bills which have already passed both Houses.

Mr. THOMAS. Under that statement, I withdraw my objection, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 14, after line 17, to strike out:

The name of John McCarthy, late of U. S. S. Ohio and Cambridge, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 8, to insert:

The name of Demmie Inman, widow of Nelson Inman, late of Company I, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 12, to insert:

The name of Gertrude Brown, widow of Robert B. Brown, late second Lieutenant Company E, One hundred and fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 16, to insert:

The name of Charles Crismon, late of Capt. Smith's company, Utah Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 20, to insert:

The name of Emily J. Walton, widow of Armstrong Walton, late of Company C, One hundred and forty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I inquire what is the number of that bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate bill 833, Calendar No. 34.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not see the chairman of the committee here, but I should like to ask whoever is in charge of the bill where is the report of the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a report on the bill, and I will say to the Senator, inasmuch as he has come into the Senate since I made the statement previously, that the three pension bills appearing on the calendar reported by the Committee on Pensions were reported by that committee at the last session of Congress and were passed by the Senate and also by the House of Representatives with some five or six amendments. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate at this session drew the bills according to the form in which they were passed by the House and were amended in the Senate, and the amendments which have been reported include those which were agreed to by the Senate at the last session of Congress. There are no items in the bill other than those that have been considered and passed upon by this body.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, of course the fact that the bills have been passed before may add some merit to them, but it is a most unusual proceeding for a bill of this length, containing something like 150 names upon it, not to have a line of report accompanying it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am positive that there is a report on the bill, and I will give its number. The report on this particular bill is No. 48; the report on the bill just passed is No. 47; and the report on the third bill is No. 49.

Mr. BRYAN. Has the Senator a copy of the report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary says there is a report filed of 59 pages.

Mr. SMOOT. I will hand the Senator a copy of the report.

Mr. BRYAN. Very well. Of course, Mr. President, it is too late to discuss the matter, as the bill has practically passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

The bill (S. 834) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the bill go over until the report is submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I should not like to have it appear that the committee has not made a report on this bill. The report on this bill is No. 49 and is here, if the Senator desires a copy of it.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, of course I should like to see a copy of the report. Copies are supposed to be placed on the desks of Senators. I asked the chairman of the committee the other day where the report was, but he did not know, and I supposed none had been printed. I have had no opportunity to go through this bill, and I want that opportunity; so I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. On that statement of the Senator I will not object to the bill going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EDWARD L. KEYES.

The resolution (S. Res. 100) directing the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate to accord a hearing to Edward L. Keyes was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday when this resolution was called for consideration the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] stated that he desired to secure certain information from the Senator making the report. For that reason I ask that the resolution go over to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

The resolution (S. Res. 97) authorizing the Committee on Commerce or any subcommittee thereof to hold hearings, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be laid over. It relates to affairs pending before the Committee on Commerce. I am not prepared to take it up to-day. I will ask the Senator in charge of it that it may be laid over until some other day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

WASHINGTON-OREGON CORPORATION.

The bill (S. 821) authorizing the Secretary of War to relieve the Washington-Oregon Corporation, as far as he may deem advisable in the public interests, from certain conditions in an act entitled "An act granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved August 9, 1912, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, yesterday my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] asked that this bill might go over. I have conferred with him about it, but I do not yet know whether or not he is satisfied with the measure. Therefore I shall have to ask that it go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION.

The bill (S. 2065) to provide for participation by the Government of the United States in the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] asked that this bill go over. He is not now in the Chamber. As the provisions of the bill affect his State, I ask that it go over to-day also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let the joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 48) to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING BUREAU.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been once read to the Senate. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the Committee on the Library.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That there is hereby created a bureau to be known as the 'legislative drafting bureau.'

"SEC. 2. That the said bureau shall be under the direction of an officer, to be known as the 'chief draftsman,' to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, without reference to party affiliations, and solely on the ground of fitness to perform the duties of the office. He shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and shall hold office for the term of 10 years unless sooner removed by the President upon the recommendation of the Judiciary Committees of both Houses of Congress, acting jointly.

"SEC. 3. That there shall be in said bureau such assistants as Congress may from time to time provide. They shall be appointed by the chief draftsman solely with reference to their fitness for their particular duties.

"SEC. 4. That public bills, or amendments to public bills, shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President, any committee of either House of Congress, or of 8 Members of the Senate or of 25 Members of the House of Representatives. The Judiciary Committees of both Houses of Congress acting jointly may, from time to time, prescribe rules and regulations for the conduct of the said bureau, including provision for drafting and revision upon such other requests as may be deemed advisable.

"SEC. 5. That the chief draftsman shall submit annually to the Secretary of the Treasury estimates of the appropriations necessary for the maintenance of the said bureau, and shall make to Congress at the beginning of each regular session a report as to the affairs of the said bureau for the preceding fiscal year, which shall include a detailed statement of appropriations and expenditures.

"SEC. 6. That the Librarian of Congress is authorized and directed to establish in the Library of Congress a division to be known as the 'legislative reference division' of the Library of Congress, and to employ competent persons therein to gather, classify, and make available in translations, indexes, digests, compilations, and bulletins, and otherwise, data for or bearing upon legislation, to render such data serviceable to Congress and committees and Members thereof and to the legislative drafting bureau, and to provide in his annual estimates for the compensation of such persons, for the acquisition of material required for their work, and for other expenses incidental thereto."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] desires to propose some amendments to the bill. Because of his absence I feel constrained, much against my own will, to ask that the matter go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the bill is laid aside I should like to make an inquiry, Mr. President. From the reading of the amendment I got the impression that upon the request of the President or a committee of Congress the proposed bureau might redraft a bill. Does that mean that if a Senator should introduce a bill and a committee should report it the bill could be sent to this officer and he could change it?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no.

Mr. BRISTOW. I got that impression from the reading of the amendment. I thought that would be rather an extraordinary thing.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; he will act only in an advisory capacity. It is of the highest importance to both the Senate and the House that we should have a legislative reference bureau here, such as has been found so essential and necessary in other parliamentary bodies. As the matter is going over, however, perhaps it is unnecessary to go further into the subject.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to say a word with reference to what has been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I understand this is substantially the same bill that was reported at the last session of Congress.

Mr. OWEN. It is.

Mr. ROOT. I think no change whatever has been made in the bill. It was very fully considered and discussed, after hearings.

The fundamental idea of the bill is to give the benefit of a trained, experienced student in the preparation of bills; not to take a bill after it has been passed upon, but to perform the function which is now performed to great advantage by the officers who are called counsel in the British House of Commons. The idea is to have a more or less permanent officer who is familiar with existing legislation and with the decisions of the courts, who can take a measure that has been drafted with the slender opportunity for examination and research which we have here and see how it fits into the existing laws of the country and what its effect will be under the existing decisions of the courts and suggest better, clearer, more unambiguous, and more effective forms of expression.

This officer would be available for the committees of Congress. We frequently find a committee taking a measure with which it agrees in principle, but which is unsatisfactory in form, and trying to thrash it into shape under great difficulties and without very much satisfaction. Under this bill the committee would be able to send such a measure to this officer to be put into shape in accordance with the instructions of the committee. If any Member of the Senate or of the House wishes to have a bill drafted to accomplish a particular purpose, and no committee is willing to send it to this officer, by having a request made by a specified number of Senators or Members of the House he can secure the rendering of this service.

I think, sir, that this is one of the most important and will be found to be one of the most beneficial steps in advance in the reform of American methods of legislation. A very large part of the litigation and the miscarriages of intention on the part of the lawmakers of the country and the failure of our people to get by legislation the relief which they wish to have and which their representatives in Congress wish to give them comes from the fact that laws are carelessly drawn; that laws are drawn without a sufficient study or a sufficient understanding of what is going to be the resultant of putting them into the same system with existing laws under existing decisions.

We need trained and intelligent assistance in the drafting of laws. I am sure, sir, that the same experience which in a number of our States, notably in Wisconsin and a number of other States, has worked out to a satisfactory conclusion along this line will be duplicated in our national legislation. I feel very strongly that this is a practical measure of reform in legislation.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I can see that such an officer would be very useful, but this is the language that attracted my attention:

SEC. 4. That public bills or amendments to public bills shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President, any committee of either House of Congress—

And so forth.

The section uses the expression "public bills." I thought a public bill was a bill that might be reported here from a committee. Would the President have a right, under this language, to ask this officer to revise such a bill?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly not. If the President wants to recommend a measure to Congress, he will have a right to call upon this officer to make a draft in accordance with his recommendation. A committee which agrees with the principle of a bill that is proposed will have a right to call upon him to make a draft to give effect to that principle. Nobody has to do anything with it after it is done, and nothing can be done with a bill that is introduced by anyone unless it is upon his own request.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, if that is the purpose of the bill I can see that it would be very useful; but I got the impression that "a bill" might be any bill pending.

Mr. ROOT. No. The work that is done has no legal or binding effect whatever. It is merely an assistance of which the committees and other public officers may avail themselves.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this matter is going over; but with all due deference and the profoundest respect for the author of this bill, and for the distinguished Senator from New York who has so highly commended it, I wish to say that I think it is the most astonishing piece of legislation I have ever heard proposed in this body. If the time has come, or is likely to come, when Senators are going to need a schoolmaster to teach them how to draft a bill, I think it is about time that the Senators who are in such need should retire to their homes, resume their seats on their school benches, and let somebody else come here who is capable of doing such work.

I may overestimate myself, but I am very free and very frank to say that I do not myself need any such assistance. Not only do I not need any such assistance, but I should not be willing to subject myself to any such supervision, to use the mildest term. The idea, that Members of the Congress of the United States, chosen men, who are presumed, at least, whether that presumption is realized or not, to be educated men, men skilled in public affairs, men with knowledge of the existing laws and of conditions of affairs calling for the enactment of new laws, need somebody to supervise them and to put in shape measures which they favor and which they profess to advocate! Why, Mr. President, I can scarcely find words to express my astonishment that such a thing should be proposed in this body.

Now, Mr. President, it may be that such a method of procedure is found convenient in the British House of Commons, but the Senators who cite the British House of Commons in this particular, as in a good many others at other times, fail to recognize the essential and fundamental differences between the House of Commons and either branch of our Congress. The House of Commons is a body from which, in the main, is taken the ministry. There are some few from the House of Lords, but they are generally more ornamental and formal than they are active and efficient members of the ministry. With a few exceptions, they have had some local ones, prominent members from the House of Lords, some premiers; but as a general rule the ministry in England is taken from the House of Commons, and that ministry is but a committee of the House of Commons, so far as it is composed of the members of the House of Commons. It is the executive branch practically, though not nominally, of the British Government; and such being the case, being absolutely responsible to the House of Commons, and without the support of the House of Commons not being able to exist or to continue in power, it is perfectly natural that the great body of the House of Commons takes little or no active part in the framing of legislation. It is done largely by the ministry, and it is a very convenient matter for it, I presume, to have, as I understand from the learned Senator from New York, such an agency as it is now proposed to provide us with. The bills are introduced, in a large measure, if I understand correctly, by those who thus represent the House of Commons; and it is for that reason that those matters are known as Government measures, because the Government there is represented by the ministry itself, being a part, in the main and almost exclusively, of the House of Commons. Bills are introduced by them and those who are the supporters of the Government line up behind them. While I do not profess to speak accurately in regard to the matter, I think it is true that few bills of any consequence are introduced in the House of Commons on the majority side except by those who represent the Government in the ministry or by those acting with the approval of the ministry.

That is not the case here, Mr. President. Every Senator here is the equal of every other Senator, and every Senator here is in a position to propose legislation. Every Senator here is in a position to attempt to mold legislation, and no one here, whether he be on the majority side or on the minority side, is clothed with the power to suggest legislation and to frame legislation with the expectation and understanding that it is to be recognized as a measure to be supported in whole by those who favor the dominant party in the legislative body.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BACON. So it is altogether a different matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it probable that if we had such an officer as this a number of the treaties that have been prepared and reported to the Senate might have been understood by at least the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, all of whom differed as to the meaning of the language used?

Mr. BACON. I will refer the Senator from Oregon to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to answer that question, as he has framed more treaties than any other Secretary of State in half a century, and I may also say that I think among the best that have been framed either before or since that time.

Mr. President, let us go further. Language used by men is necessarily an imperfect vehicle. Necessarily there is frequently ambiguity. Necessarily the opinions of men will differ on the construction of language.

I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I think a careful examination of the treaties which have been made by the Government of the United States, and notably the later ones, which I presume the Senator from Oregon has in view, have been framed with very great care and with a most excellent choice of language, and with as much skill in the avoidance of ambiguity as any other compositions that I know of.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And not only in the matter of treaties, but if I recall correctly there have been words used in the Sherman antitrust law and other important——

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And in other important pieces of legislation which not only the Senate generally did not understand when the bill was enacted into law but which the Supreme Court itself did not understand. So I say, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, if such an officer as this were provided by law to go over and study the use of words and to report to the Senators or Members having bills in charge very much of this misunderstanding might be done away with in the future.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator will wake up and find himself entirely mistaken in that anticipation. The contrary has been true from the beginning of the world. We have a book we call the inspired book; if that belief is correct, it should have the most accurate and best choice of language. Yet I should like to know where in all the range of spoken or written language the Senator would find any book which has given more controversy as to what it meant, in some particulars at least, than the Bible. That has been true of all propositions. It is true of all statutes which have been enacted into law particularly, and vast libraries full of the decisions of courts construing statutes about which men have differed are the best testimony to the truth of what I now say.

Even the members of the courts themselves differ as to what language means in a particular case. As suggested to me by my friend from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the greatest of lawyers have with the utmost care drawn wills about the construction of which there has been vast litigation, great consideration by courts, and frequently an absolute overturning of what was the purpose of the lawyer in drawing the will, and I presume there is no lawyer who might not have a similar experience.

But, Mr. President, who could hope that this schoolmaster, whom we propose to provide an office for at the rate of $7,500 a year, could possibly——

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, who could possibly suppose that he should rise to such a height of perfection in the use of human language that he could bring here compositions about the construction of which there would be no difficulty and no doubt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I hope to be permitted to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that, if he had read the bill more carefully, perhaps he would not have spoken of this drafting bureau as exercising a supervision over the Senate and being a schoolmaster over the Senate. It is only to be used by those who are not entirely confident of their ability to draft a complicated act in such a way as to comport with every statute that is on the statute book and with every decision that has been reported with regard to it. There are some of us in this body who are not so absolutely sure of themselves in drafting important measures. I took part in reporting this bill, and I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he obviously misunderstands the scope and purpose of it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I do not assume to myself all the knowledge the Senator from Oklahoma suggests this proposed congressional schoolmaster is to have. I do not think within the range between the two oceans he is going to find a man who knows all the laws which have been passed and all the decisions which have been made and who will be prepared when a bill is submitted to him to say whether or not it will in any manner trench upon any other act which has been passed or is consistent with any provision of a statute passed, or whether it is consistent with every decision of the courts which has been made. Those are things which we develop in our discussions here. In our discussions we find out when a bill has been introduced whether it is a proper bill. The test by which a bill is to be judged is whether or not it conflicts with the law already on the statute books and whether, if it does thus conflict, it is one which should prevail and the existing law be set aside. It is in the debates of this body, in the suggestions of ninety-odd Senators, each bringing his modicum of knowledge to the general fund, and by a comparison and examination that we ascertain whether legislation is proper to be enacted or not.

But, this, Mr. President, seems to have a very wide scope in view. This proposed prodigy is not only to be a schoolmaster who is to put bills in proper shape when Senators are themselves not capable of writing good English, but he is to be a wise man, who is not only to exercise that remarkable function, but the greater function of relieving Senators of the necessity of study, of relieving Senators of the necessity of comparing each his view with the views of the ninety-odd Senators and saying, "You can not pass this bill; that would not be according to law. You have not considered such and such a statute; you have not examined such and such a decision. I know it all. You need not examine it. What I tell you you can rely on and act upon." It is now to be done by this remarkable man whom I have denominated as a schoolmaster, but who will be very much greater than a schoolmaster. He would be an all-wise man. He would be the most learned man who was ever seen in this or in any country. If such a man could be found and if, in addition to his great wisdom, his great learning, you could engraft upon him absolute sincerity of purpose and patriotism, he would be a man who should be installed as the lawmaker of this country, and let the gentlemen who are so deficient in the ordinary rudiments of the English language and who are so ignorant of law, that which exists and is found in the statute books and as well in the decisions of the courts, go home, and let this schoolmaster and this all-wise man perform our functions for us.

Now, Mr. President, there is another thing that I want to call the attention of the Senate to. I confess I have not read the bill carefully. If I had seen it before and had had time to reflect upon it, it would perhaps not have astonished me so greatly. I confess that it has absolutely "knocked me off my pins" that there should be such a suggestion in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator say it "knocked him off his pins"?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Illinois once lived in Georgia, and he knows what that means. It is a slang expression and possibly I ought not to have used it in this connection. But, Mr. President, aside from this consideration, I may be wrong about it, but it is absolutely irreconcilable, from my point of view, of what our duty is here and what our function is here.

Aside from that, I think the bill is absolutely out of order. It has been introduced here in contravention of the rules of the Senate. If not a technical violation of the rules, it is a violation of the spirit of our rules. Is not this a change, a most radical change, in the rules of the Senate? It is the most far-reaching rule that I have known proposed in the Senate. Was there any notice ever given of any such proposed change of the rules? Was it introduced as a change of the rules? Has it ever been to the Committee on Rules?

Let us see whether it is a change of the rules or not. Under the rules as they now exist any Senator has a right to draft and introduce a bill. Certainly it was a very gross oversight in those who first framed the existing rules to suppose that Senators would be competent for such business.

Mr. OWEN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the proposed measure does not prevent a Senator from drawing a bill.

Mr. BACON. I was going to call attention to what I meant by it. I may be wrong about it.

Mr. OWEN. I think, obviously, the Senator has not read the bill.

Mr. BACON. I confess I have not read it all through. I have not read it clear through, but I have read enough to satisfy myself about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BACON. I was about to state——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill provides:

That public bills, or amendments to public bills, shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President.

Mr. BACON. Of course. That is what I was going to call attention to. I presume when it says "President," it means the President of the United States. There is a capital "P" here. And we are going to have the remarkable revolution in this country that when a public bill is to be introduced, the President of the United States is to notify this schoolmaster and this all-wise man to draft a bill and bring it in here. I do not see how, under the language which was read by the Senator from Mississippi, any one of the Senators——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me just a moment. I do not see how any one of the Senators, whom our constituents have made such a great mistake about as to suppose for an instant that they knew how to draft a bill or knew anything about the conditions of this country which would justify legislation——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I will yield, though I had not finished my sentence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill provides—

That public bills, or amendments to public bills, shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President, any committee of either House of Congress, or of 8 Members of the Senate, or of 25 Members of the House of Representatives.

One good thing about it is that it takes 25 of them to 8 of us.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am raising the question whether or not this is a change of the rules. Is it not mandatory? What are public bills? You may say that a bill for a pension to John Jones is not a public bill, or a bill to authorize the construction of a bridge over a river might not be called a public bill. I am not sure about it, especially the latter one, because that concerns the public pretty largely, and affects the question of interstate commerce and all that. But there are private bills.

What are public bills? Of late most of the legislation is enacted under bills introduced which would be classed as public bills. I think the bills that would not be classed as public bills are comparatively few. Yet we come into this Chamber, and I presume if the Senator from New York rose in his place to introduce a bill it would be in order for the Vice President or possibly some Senator to say to the Senator from New York, "Has the Senator from New York submitted that bill to this schoolmaster, to this all-wise man? Was it drafted by him or was it drafted by the Senator from New York?" And if it should be found that the Senator from New York had had the temerity, the self-assertion, the self-confidence to presume to draft a bill and introduce it he would be declared out of order because that schoolmaster had not drafted it or revised it and approved it. That would be about the size of it.

Now, Mr. President, I continue where the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] very properly interrupted me. I do not know that I ought to discuss it now, but certainly I will at the proper time if it ever comes up again, but as the matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate I think it ought to be properly characterized now. Is this or is it not a bill changing the rules of the Senate? Could there be a bill which would more effectively and radically change the rules of the Senate than this bill?

Nobody can question the fact, as I was proceeding to say, that under the present rules each Senator has the right to draft a bill and introduce it in the Senate, and nobody has now the right to ask him whether it was drafted by this remarkable wise man whom you propose to find, and who can not be found. We may find some one who will approach him, but certainly not one who will fill all his great perfections.

Does this bill prohibit a Senator from introducing a bill in the Senate? Will this bill, if enacted into law, change the rule in that regard? There is no doubt about the fact that every Senator now has the right to frame and introduce a bill without reference to this wise man. Will he have that right when the section of the bill read by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] becomes law?

That public bills, or amendments to public bills—

Why, Mr. President, a Senator could not even get up here and say, "I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment" unless he would be subject to the inquiry from the Chair or from a Senator, "Has that amendment been submitted to this congressional schoolmaster? Has he drafted and approved it?" The language is:

That public bills, or amendments to public bills, shall be drafted——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Assuming, without admitting, that the criticisms of the Senator from Georgia are correct, is he not now demonstrating the necessity of some schoolmaster in the drafting of bills?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, if I were presenting a bill which was imperfect I should say that it was a demonstration; but I am not presenting it. Does the Senator refer to this bill?

Mr. POMERENE. I understood that the Senator from Georgia was criticizing this particular bill.

Mr. BACON. I am.

Mr. POMERENE. And if so, I suggested that he was making a very strong argument in favor of the necessity of some schoolmaster in the drafting of bills.

Mr. BACON. By no means. I think the bill, so far as its composition is concerned, is very properly drafted. I am not criticizing the grammar, or the English, or the composition, or the rhetoric of the bill in any way, but I am talking about what the bill seeks to accomplish. If the language means what it purports to mean, the bill seeks to accomplish the end that a public bill, anything which shall be denominated as a public bill, or anything which shall be considered as an amendment to that which shall be taken as a public bill, shall be drafted by this all-wise man—this $7,500 man.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia at what particular stage of the proceedings the President of the United States might ask for a revision of a bill or of an amendment offered in the Senate?

Mr. BACON. I do not know. I suppose, though——

Mr. WORKS. I understood the Senator to say that the language of this bill was perfectly clear.

Mr. BACON. Well, no; I did not say that. I spoke of the composition of the bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] asked me whether I was not demonstrating the fact, by my criticism of this bill, that we ought to have a schoolmaster to draft the bill. I was replying to that when I said that I was not criticizing the rhetoric of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. It strikes me, Mr. President, that section 4 of the bill is exceedingly ambiguous in its terms. I think the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has suggested what might be the proper construction of it, and yet the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who is certainly as competent as any of us to construe the meaning of language, takes an exactly opposite view of its meaning.

Mr. BACON. It demonstrates, Mr. President, the fact to which I have already alluded, that it is an extremely difficult thing for anyone to draft a bill or to write a sentence which, by reason of the imperfection of human language, will not be susceptible to more than one construction.

I am not, however, going to detain the Senate, but I do want to make this point distinctly—for it is a good point, and possibly Senators may feel the necessity, if they wish to pursue this matter, to begin over again—I say this bill proposes a change in the rules. It contains a positive requirement that every public bill and every amendment to a public bill, to go no further—I am speaking of the provision which refers to the President and the committees of the two Houses—that every public bill and every amendment to a public bill shall be drafted by this all-wise man. That is an utter contravention and overthrow of the present rule of the Senate. The rule of the Senate is that whenever an amendment of the rules is proposed notice in writing shall be given at least one day in advance of the purpose to amend the rules, and that thereafter the amendment shall be introduced. Of course it can then be properly acted upon.

Mr. President, it is true that it is proposed to do this by an act of Congress; but, nevertheless, it would be a change of the rules. We do not have the rules of the Senate controlled by acts of Congress, and I understand that the province of the Senate is to frame its own rules, and it is the rule of the Senate to require certain notice to be given of a proposal to amend the rules or to make new rules. This can not be evaded by the passage of a bill.

But, Mr. President, of course this matter, if it ever comes up for discussion, is one which will not be limited to the very superficial examination which I have given to this bill. I think it is utterly indefensible, it is astonishing that it should be proposed, and I never expect to see the day when the bill will be enacted into law.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have been very much amazed at the criticisms made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. The misinterpretation of the bill by the Senator from Georgia is the more surprising because this matter has been before Congress not only during this session of Congress but in the previous Congress. I hold in my hand the report on the bill to create a legislative drafting bureau and reference division, made to the Senate last year, Calendar No. 1051, Report No. 1271, and I shall ask to place in the RECORD the first two pages of that report, which explain very fully the object of this proposed legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LEGISLATIVE DRAFTING BUREAU AND REFERENCE DIVISION.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 8337:

The Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 8337) to create a legislative drafting bureau and to establish a legislative reference division of the Library of Congress, has considered the same and has given hearings thereon, and now returns the same to the Senate with some amendments and recommends that the bill be passed as amended.

This bill aims to assist the Members and committees of the Senate and House in the preparation and consideration of legislation in two ways: First, by increasing the usefulness of the Library of Congress in furnishing statistics, historical matter, discussions, and systematizing information generally bearing upon legislation. Second, by the employment of persons of experience and special skill in the drafting of provisions, adapted to secure the object sought, consistent with existing laws, conforming to the decisions of courts, avoiding past mistakes, and free from ambiguity and uncertainty.

In both of these respects all that the bill undertakes to do has already been done by some of the States of our Union and by the British House of Commons. The bill reported is the result of applying the experience of Wisconsin, New York, Alabama, Indiana, Michigan, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, and Texas.

The Library of Congress now renders most useful services in furnishing Members of both Houses material useful for the consideration of legislation. The Librarian of Congress has testified that the special organization of a legislative reference division would greatly increase the practical utility of the work now done. He says:

"What we do not do, and what a legislative reference division in the Library would do, is to select out of this great collection—now 2,000,000 books and pamphlets—the material that may bear upon one or another of the topics under consideration by Congress or that are likely to be under consideration, or that come up under particular discussions; extracting, digesting, and concentrating material that will bear upon those questions, to be set aside, available to Congress or to the individual Member of Congress or a committee of Congress. It requires duplication of material; it requires an approach to the material from a different direction from that from which we now approach it. We now have the material in the files of serials, official publications, etc., in its primary form; but such a bureau as this would seek material with reference to one or another of these topics. That distinction is pointed out in the first five pages of my report of 1911."

In the drafting of bills it is proposed to have a competent and nonpartisan draftsman who can render the same kind of service to Members and committees in the framing of measures which Mr. Hinds so long rendered in the House of Representatives upon parliamentary questions. There is a general agreement that there are serious defects prevailing in our legislation, both in Congress and in our State legislatures. These defects arise in part from the fact that many provisions are drafted as matters of first impression. Words are used which seem to the draftsman adapted to accomplish his purpose, but when those words are considered in connection with all the existing laws of which they are made to form a part they may have an entirely different effect from that which was intended, and when they are considered with reference to all the existing decisions of the courts by which they may be construed they are often found to be utterly futile or to produce quite unexpected results. The effect of continually thrusting provisions into the body of the law without considering carefully what is already there is to make a jumble of statutes which creates uncertainty, breeds litigation, and makes the law ineffective. Another difficulty arises from the fact that the drafting of statutes demands exceptional capacity for clear and definite statement, and many very strong and useful legislators have not that capacity. This subject has now been before Congress a number of years. Many bills have been introduced in the Senate and the House. The House committee had very full hearings several years ago and the Senate Committee on the Library has had the benefit of those hearings. The committee transmits herewith as part of this report a printed copy of the hearings taken before it upon which it has based its conclusions.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the bill does not propose in any way to interfere with the right of a Senator to draft a bill and to introduce it, but the only purpose is to authorize and direct the proposed drafting bureau, in charge of a trained student of legislative language and processes, to draft a bill when called on to do so by any of the authorities of the United States. It does indeed——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very much interested in the discussion of the question, and I should like to have the Senator from Oklahoma explain at what stage in the consideration of a bill the President would be authorized to ask for a recasting or a rewriting of the bill.

Mr. OWEN. I am glad the Senator from Mississippi has asked me that question, because it affords me an opportunity to explain the matter. It frequently happens that the President of the United States, charged with the execution of the laws of the United States, in the administration of a law finds some defect in it, and it often happens that he suggests to Congress changes therein; and it has not infrequently happened that the members of his Cabinet have sent to Congress drafts of proposed legislative bills which they thought would meet a certain purpose. We frequently pass upon such matters when a bill is referred from this body to a committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not want——

Mr. OWEN. Just one moment. When a bill goes to a committee of this body the committee will often send that bill for a report to the executive branch of the Government. The executive branch will frequently make a report upon it and state that the bill is defective in a certain particular and will suggest a new draft. This proposition is only to give the President and the members of his Cabinet an opportunity to get the benefit of the services of the proposed drafting bureau.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the President could act and operate only through Congress.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, certainly. It is only to make available for the officers of the United States, the President, the Senate, and the other House the opportunity of getting the best expert advice when they are drawing some important measure.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what meaning he gives to the word "revised" as used in that connection. The bill provides not only that the President, for example, may call for the drafting of a bill, but that he may require that it be "revised." There is no limitation at all upon the time or the occasion or the kind of amendment to a bill that the President may call upon the bureau to revise, except that it shall be a public bill.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator from California that when a bill has been drafted and it is found to be defective, or is believed to be defective, any person may revise that form and make suggestions of amendment. Anybody may do that, either in Congress or out of Congress.

Mr. WORKS rose.

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment, and I will complete the answer. It is, therefore, no grant of extraordinary power that is proposed, but this drafting bureau may, upon request, revise or redraft the language that has been used by anybody else. Such a bill is, after all, merely a draft; it has no validity and no force until some Senator or some Member of the other House offers it to the body of which he is a Member and submits it for their consideration. Previously to that time it is just so much waste paper, so far as being a bill pending in Congress is concerned.

If this language be defective, as Senators appear to think, let them revise it within the scope of the meaning which I give to it, which is the true meaning, no matter how variously it may be interpreted on this floor. The very fact that any language used may be interpreted by Senators in more than one way emphasizes the importance and the need of a drafting bureau that shall employ language which, if possible, shall not be capable of a double interpretation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I am not claiming that the language is defective, but the bill certainly provides in express terms that this bureau shall, on the request of the President, revise any bill or amendment. Now, I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. Perhaps it would be better to say the "form of any bill."

Mr. WORKS. Just one moment. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what right the President of the United States would have to interfere and to have revised an amendment offered to any bill by the Senator from Oklahoma, for example?

Mr. OWEN. None whatever.

Mr. WORKS. But this bill provides for that in express terms.

Mr. OWEN. If it does, change the language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Suppose the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] introduces a bill; at what stage of the proceedings would the President have a right to call upon this bureau to revise that bill and upon whose communication as to its imperfections?

Mr. OWEN. He would not have that right at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, what does this language mean:

That public bills or amendments to public bills shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President——

Mr. OWEN. It means that if the President of the United States desires to submit a bill upon a certain subject he may appeal to this bureau and use their services in drafting it before he does submit it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The President of the United States has no power under the Constitution to introduce a bill in the Senate or the House.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think the President of the United States has any power to introduce a bill in the Senate or the House. Nobody has ever contended that he has, so far as I know, and nobody ever suggested it except the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, no; I beg the Senator's pardon. The language is:

That public bills, or amendments to public bills, shall be drafted or revised by the said bureau on request of the President—

Now, mark you, it says not only "drafted," but "revised."

Mr. OWEN. Yes; both.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that means anything at all, it means that some existing bill in the Senate or the House which has been already introduced by some Representative or Senator shall be revised by this bureau upon request of the President.

Mr. OWEN. The term "bill" technically, perhaps, might be construed to be a bill after it has been introduced, yet the term is constantly used as applying to a measure which is in process of being drawn. We speak——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. Before the tariff bill was ever introduced at all it was continually referred to as the pending bill before the committee. A bill may be drawn in the committee and may be brought out by the committee as a committee bill, not having been previously introduced in the Senate as a bill. It is only one of the many uses of language where there is more than one meaning. Technically, I agree that before a measure becomes a bill it must first be introduced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I will ask the Senator if this provision does not mean "revised" in the sense in which I have explained it, must it not refer to a bill to be originally introduced by the President?

Mr. OWEN. I think perhaps the language there to which the Senator is referring——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Let me finish.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, go ahead and finish.

Mr. OWEN. I want to be allowed to finish. I think the bill might be better——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will please conduct the discussion so that others can hear it. The Chair would like to hear a little of it himself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought I had obtained the consent of the Senator from Oklahoma to interrupt him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator did not do so by addressing the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought that I addressed the Chair before I addressed the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the matter now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII is the order under which the Senate is proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But this bill went over, as I understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It did.

Mr. OWEN. It went over on request of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I so understood.

Mr. OWEN. And we are now discussing it at length.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will have to ask for the regular order because I am not hearing much of the discussion, although I am interested in the matter.

Mr. OWEN. I am quite content to have the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 14, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 12, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father soul, above all, through all, and in us all, make us conscious of Thy presence and impress us with Thy thoughts and ways, that we may emphasize them in our lives; and as the moon reflects the glory of the sun, so may we reflect Thy glory by filling our appointed niche in the world, great or small, without ostentation, and thus hasten the coming of Thy kingdom upon the earth. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 9, 1913, was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF BENJAMIN F. BUSH.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by Benjamin F. Bush, president of the Missouri Pacific Railway Co. and the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Co., before the Economic Club of New York City, on April 29 last. The address is a most able one, and gives much valuable information concerning the railroads, a subject—the railroads and their employees—with which Congress is at the present time greatly concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address referred to is as follows:

"Mr. President and gentlemen of the Economic Club, a careful and impartial analysis of the railroad situation as it exists to-day irresistibly forces the conclusion that there is no subject before the people, no policy engaging the attention of the Government, that in its future economic aspect foreshadows more dangers, both to the commerce of this country and to our institutions, than does that of railroad transportation; therefore, that it be solved rightly it should receive the most scrupulous consideration.

"The wonderful commercial progress of the United States has been made possible only by the railroads. Since 1870, when the impetus given railroad construction began, the wealth of this country has increased from $30,000,000,000 to the enormous sum of $140,000,000,000. Its foreign commerce, in the main largely dependent upon the railroads, from $800,000,000 to $4,000,000,000. The internal commerce of the railroads to-day has reached the stupendous figures of over 293,000,000,000 of units of service—being the tons of freight hauled 1 mile and the passengers carried 1 mile.

"The volume of this railroad commerce has nearly doubled in 12 years, and taking cognizance of the alert and progressive spirit of our people and our still latent and undeveloped resources—in farm, mine, forest, and factory—an alluring promise is foreshadowed for a continued increase.

"The fulfillment of this promise rests entirely upon the ability of the railroads to improve their existing plants to a higher state of efficiency, to extend their lines into the undeveloped regions and thereby provide the necessary facilities for the prompt movement and distribution of the products arising from the awakened activity. The commercial supremacy of the world is the heritage of our Nation if the means at our command are wisely applied.

"As to how the railroads can secure the money necessary to make the improvements and extensions to efficiently provide for the carriage of the existing and increasing traffic, so that all lines of industry may develop and operate to full advantage and our vast tide of commerce still further expand and flow unrestricted to its final haven, is the railroad problem.

"As the conditions are to-day, by reason of not having the means at their command, the railroads, with few if any exceptions, can not give proper movement to the large volume of existing traffic. This was likewise true in 1906, 1907, 1910, and 1912. The transportation facilities are not keeping pace with the increasing traffic requirements.

"At the period of their inception, railroads were crudely constructed, but they supplied the needs of the time in moving the sparse traffic then offered for shipment. They were built on the lines of least resistance to meet the varying characteristics of the contour and topography of the country traversed. Later, with the growth of traffic and more urgent requirements, radical improvements had to be made to meet the changed conditions. Practically the lines had to be almost rebuilt—in reducing grades, eliminating curves, replacing wooden with more substantial steel and concrete bridges, widening roadbed and embankments, ballasting track, deepening and widening ditches, constructing cross drains, building viaducts over road crossings, building sidings, passing and double tracks, providing heavier rails and ties, larger engines and cars, spacious terminals in large cities, more commodious station buildings, engine houses, shops, and many other appurtenances. As the means have permitted, this work of rebuilding and enlarging and improving the roadbed and equipment has been prosecuted, so that a higher standard of service and efficiency might be forthcoming. Billions of dollars have been already expended in this work, but much yet remains to be done before the roads reach that stage of completion that the constantly increasing traffic can be satisfactorily handled. This will require more billions of dollars. The money can not be supplied from earnings, as on account of inadequate compensation for service rendered the earnings in many cases are scarcely sufficient to maintain the properties in a solvent condition.

"How, then, can this necessary capital be obtained? A railroad to obtain money for extensions into new fields or for the improvement of existing lines must, like a merchant, have an established credit. It must be able to show by past or current operations that it will be able to meet the new interest obligations it assumes and have a surplus over and above all its requirements. Not many railroads are able to do this under the existing operating conditions of high wages paid for labor, increased cost of materials, the higher standard of service demanded by the people, and governmental compulsory expense and regulation of charges for transportation.

"Legislation of the most onerous character has in recent years been enacted by Federal and State authority, entailing numerous expenditures without any compensatory provision, many of the acts being entirely without beneficial results to the public and only an economic waste. Three or four bills now being urged upon Congress are estimated to involve an expenditure by the railroads within the next four years of nearly $1,500,000,000.

"These many expenses, over which the railroad manager has no power of control, have steadily increased the unit cost of operation; and as the unit of compensation for transportation service is regulated by Federal and State authority, and is more often reduced than advanced, it follows that the unit of profit is steadily decreasing. If these two opposing units of conditions, cost and compensation, are allowed to continue in their course, it means they will meet in time and all profit will be expunged.

"It may be thought, however, that the revenue derived from the increased business will more than offset the increased expense. Such is the view of the ordinary layman who has given the matter only cursory study. If the roads were not working to their full capacity—that is, if they had unused engines, cars, tracks, and terminal facilities—they could to some degree for a time offset the increased expenses by additional earnings; but when, as in 1906, 1907, 1910, and 1912, they were burdened with business beyond their capacity, the excess entails an expense much greater than the average cost.

"The gross earnings of the railroads increased largely during the last half of 1907, but notwithstanding this the net earnings decreased over $22,000,000. For the last six months of 1910 the gross earnings increased over $55,000,000, while the expenses increased over $84,000,000. The volume of traffic moved in those years was very large and for many months was in excess of the capacity of the carriers.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission in 1907 declared that the inadequacy of transportation facilities was alarming, yet when the railroads sought to advance their rates in 1910 to enable them to make better provision for the public demands and establish a higher financial credit, the commission would not sanction the advance. The earnings for the roads for the two following years, 1911 and 1912, increased $11,054,000, but the operating expenses and taxes were swelled $98,544,000, leaving a less net revenue for 1912 than for 1910 by $87,490,000. This loss was equivalent to the impairment of their ability to raise over $2,187,000,000 at 4 per cent. It is thus that the net revenues of the railroads are depleted and their inability to borrow money is further emphasized. If the railroads could retrieve such yearly net losses, they would be able to strengthen their credit in the financial marts and raise the necessary funds to meet the exigent demands of the business public.

"It is a mistaken conception, though one generally prevalent, that the railroads are overcapitalized and seek to obtain exorbitant rates from the public to pay interest on the excessive capital. The fact is that the physical properties of the railroads could not be duplicated to-day for anything like the present capitalization. The money of the owners which has not been capitalized, that has been expended on the roads from year to year since their pioneer days, in betterments and improvements, roadbed, equipment, and their accessories, has long since absorbed any water there may have been in the securities.

"Such high authority as the Interstate Commerce Commission declared some time ago that the value of the physical properties of the American railroads was more than that represented by their stock and bonds. This capitalization is less than one-fourth that of the English railways and less than one-half that of the other European countries; yet high as this capitalization of foreign railroads is, they are permitted to charge such rates as yield reasonable net returns.

"The average rate received by the United States railroads for hauling a ton of freight 1 mile is three-quarters of 1 cent, while the rate received in England for a like service is over 2½ cents, or three times as much. The rates of other European countries are also much higher than ours. As has been well said by Mr. Hill, 'The American railway pays the highest wages in the world out of the lowest rates in the world, after having set down to capital account the lowest capitalization per mile of any of the great countries of the world.' He might have added, they also give the best service in the world.

"I believe it can be truthfully said that the causes of complaint in the past against the railroads have been entirely eliminated. The published tariff of charges, accessible to all, governs to-day, without discrimination or favoritism to any shipper. Complaints may arise and do arise as to rates on specified commodities between given markets on account of their relation to the rates on like or correlated commodities to and from other markets. These complaints grow out of the rivalry between communities and are the main grievances of shippers now brought before the commission.

"Shippers naturally endeavor to get the lowest rates possible, and from the standpoint of their individual interests they believe that unjust inequalities exist in rates, although such inequalities may be the result of inexorable economic laws beyond the carrier's power to control. In the adjustment of these differences between markets or rival communities the decision of the commission is almost invariably in the direction of reducing the higher rates to the lower level. In this way there is a constant nibbling at the rate fabric, which ultimately will prove as injurious as a general reduction.

"It is axiomatic that mutuality of interest exists between the railroads and the shipper; that one can not prosper unless the other does, and that injury to one will later bring injury to the other. If the shipper is charged unreasonable rates or is afforded poor service for the transportation of his wares, he suffers in his business, and this in time reacts upon the carrier. On the other hand, if the carrier receives insufficient compensation for its service by reason of inconsiderate legislation, or by unwise direction of regulative authority undue burdens are imposed which increase its expense, then it may, for lack of means, be unable to maintain its former standard of service, and thus the shipper and the carrier are both injured.

"I recognize that the railroads are in duty bound to serve the public in the best possible manner, and that the public, through the State, has the authority to regulate their operations, but when that authority is exercised with reference to the most minute and varied details, burdening the carrier with an unnecessary expense which it can not afford, then it would seem only just that the public, through the State, should allow it the necessary protection in the way of maintaining compensatory rates. This is on the principle that the right to regulate or control carries with it the obligation of reasonable protection. Authority carries with it responsibility and control imposes the duty of protection. I believe that the same principle of justice should be administered to an association of individuals known as a corporation as is administered to the individuals personally in other capacities.

"Considering what the railroads have done through the investment of private capital in upbuilding and developing the country, improving the conditions of living, uplifting the people, and adding to all the comforts and conveniences of life, they certainly are entitled to that necessary protection which will enable them to continue in their vocation and elevate to a still higher plane the social, commercial, industrial, and agricultural conditions of our people.

"An eminent public official, an authority upon this subject, has said:

"No just legislation upon this subject will proceed upon the theory that the public alone is in need of protection and that the railroads can take care of themselves. I have no sympathy with such an unfair and illogical contention.

"The United States census returns show that from 1900 to 1910 the capital value of agriculture increased from nearly $20,500,000,000 to $41,000,000,000, or 100 per cent, and the capital value of manufactures increased from $9,000,000,000 to nearly $18,500,000,000, or over 105 per cent, while the capital of the railways increased from $10,250,000,000 to less than $14,500,000,000, or only 40 per cent.

"Here we have an increase in the capital of $30,000,000,000 in those two important industries of agriculture and manufacture, which are almost entirely dependent upon the transportation lines for their successful operation, whereas the capital of the transportation lines with their many appurtenances increased only to the value of $4,250,000,000.

"And again, we find that the value of the products of manufactures increased from $11,500,000,000 to over $20,500,000,000, or 81 per cent. As the railroads get a double haul on a large portion of manufactures, the raw material into the factory and the finished product out, it may be judged how essential it is that they keep abreast of the times in road and equipment to properly take care of the constantly increasing tonnage implied by these enormous values. The largely increased volume of agricultural products, which last year exceeded $9,000,000,000 in value, must meet with more prompt consideration on the part of the carrier, for through the economic conditions governing the greater portion of it is rushed to market within a limited time.

"The census further shows that notwithstanding the large increase in the capital of manufactures of 105 per cent the net return to the owners on the total of $18,500,000,000 was over 12 per cent. Yet on the railway capital there was nothing paid on $3,500,000,000, and less than 5 per cent on $7,500,000,000. The services of the railroads make secure the most liberal returns on the enormous capital of $59,500,000,000 invested in these two industries, and therefore the manufacturers and farmers should willingly aid in an effort to get the transportation rates advanced. It is of paramount importance to their own continued welfare that they exert themselves in that direction.

"I have already alluded to the immense volume of traffic conducted by the railroads and to the fact that it has increased double-fold in 12 years. Will it continue to increase in the same ratio in the coming years?

"The marvelous resources and latent strength of this country are in many respects scarcely trenched upon. Of the total land area of the country 46 per cent is in farms, but of this land in farms only 54 per cent is improved. Only 25 per cent of our great domain is producing anything of value. My friend, ex-Gov. Hadley, of Missouri, when in office, stated in a public address that the development of Missouri's natural resources had scarcely begun; that there were three counties in the State which had no railroads and seven counties with less than 25 miles; and that of the 44,000,000 acres of land in the State more than one-half had never been touched with a plow. A like statement is applicable to many of our Western and Southern States. The opening up and cultivation of these undeveloped lands by the building of railroads would give a further impetus to general trade and industry.

"Then again, our farmers are now awakened to the benefits to be derived from the application of scientific methods in agriculture, and more intensive yields will be the result. A more careful culture of our wheat lands will easily double the yield and still be less than that of European countries, whose land has been under cultivation for more than 2,000 years. A like increase can be effected in the other cereals and products of the soil. Our project for the reclamation of the swamp and arid lands goes on apace.

"There are vast mining lands with their hidden treasures yet awaiting development. The completion of the Panama Canal will open to us more directly the trade of the Orient and western South American countries, with their hundreds of millions of beings whose wants may be supplied with our merchantable wares. The value of our exports of manufactures is now over $1,000,000,000 annually, and at the present rate of increase it doubles every three or four years. Our foreign trade in other commodities is taking on a greater momentum.

"In all these we have a magnificent vista of possibilities which portends the continual upward trend of our trade and commerce, with its concomitant of future steady employment for our people—the desideratum of all governments. The illimitable prospects betoken its continuance if ample provision is made for transportation.

"Now, with the present traffic of the railroads reaching the stupendous figures of over 293,000,000,000 of units of service, what will the future increase mean if kept up in the ratio of the past?

"You all know something of the capacity of the New York Central Railroad within your own great State and the magnitude of its operations and transportation facilities. Four per cent of the volume of traffic now annually moved by our railways would at the present day tax the full capacity of that road, working day and night for one year. As the railroads operated to their full capacity in years of active business, like last year and other past years, an idea may be formed from this illustration of the magnitude of the work that will have to be done in fitting response to the demands of commerce. The commerce is increasing on an average of 8 per cent and more per year, and notwithstanding one-half of this yearly increase would tax the capacity of one of the first railroads in the land no provision is being made, and no provision can be made, under the rates now received for transportation service for the proper and safe conduct of this prospective traffic.

"Can the railroads meet this serious situation with which they are confronted? Yes; if allowed to charge a fair compensation for their services. The railroads now receive on an average per mile 7¼ mills for hauling a ton of freight and less than 2 cents for carrying a passenger. If this average compensation could be increased even 1 mill, or the equivalent of the price of a postage stamp for 20 miles' service, it would extricate them from all further trouble and anxiety. It is scarcely conceivable that such a slight advance would injuriously affect any trade, industry, or person, yet it would be the means of conferring untold benefits upon the entire business of the country.

"The Hon. Martin A. Knapp, late chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who had 20 years' experience on that board, after a careful study of this question from all viewpoints, expressed his deliberate judgment as follows:

"Without regard to the personnel of railroad officials, without regard primarily to the interest of stockholders, but in the interest of public welfare and national prosperity, we must permit railroad earnings to be adequate for railway improvement at advantage and profit.

"The prosperity of the country is measured, and will be measured, by the ability of its railways and waterways to transport its increasing commerce. With a country of such vast extent and limitless resources, with all the means of production developed to a wonderful state of efficiency, the continued advancement of this great people depends primarily upon such an increase of transportation facilities as will provide prompt and safe movement everywhere from producer to consumer; and that we shall not secure unless the men who are relied upon to manage these great highways of commerce have fitting opportunity and the capital which is required for their needful expansion is permitted to realize fairly liberal returns.

"If the railroads are not allowed to charge a compensation for their services that will enable them to make a fair return on the investment with a reasonable surplus for betterments, improvements, and the establishment of their credit, the task on their part of meeting the situation will be hopeless. In equity and justice, they are entitled to this, and I believe if the question were understood in its different phases the good sense and fairness of the American people would be asserted in support of the railroads.

"Not only have the railroads' expenses steadily increased of late years, but the purchasing power of the compensation received for their service has decreased. In other words, while the value of a given quantity of farm products will purchase 69 per cent more ton-miles of transportation than in 1900, the purchasing power of the compensation received by the railroads for the transportation 1 mile of a given number of tons of freight in 1910 was 13 per cent less than in 1900.

"With these adverse conditions confronting the railroads, it is absolutely necessary in order that they perform their functions to the public that they be allowed to advance at an early date their service charges. This is a matter of more vital concern to the welfare of the entire people than it is to the individual owners of the railroads.

"If the railroads deteriorate in the service rendered, as they undoubtedly must if the conditions are not changed, it unmistakably means that commerce will be retarded, that industry will languish, that the many fruits of agriculture will wane, that the proud eminence we have attained in our many varied pursuits will crumble, and the unrest, discontent, and dissatisfaction of an unemployed people may lead to the establishment of a new order of things with respect to the ownership and operation of the railroads of the country, with the attendant dangers to the perpetuity of our republican institutions. So the conclusion is irresistibly forced upon us that this railroad question is a Government problem and one of very grave and serious concern, which should be satisfactorily settled, and the ominous dangers threatened averted thereby.

"The President of the United States, before his inauguration into office, asserted that—

"The measure of service rendered by business to the people will be the measure by which the merit of business shall be judged.

"The railroads can accept this declaration and be satisfied to stand or fall by its concrete application.

"I believe it will always be found that in any estimate made of the dignity and strength of our Nation, of the enlightenment and social comforts of our people, of the wealth and commercial greatness of our country, the significance of the railroads must stand forth a marked, conspicuous, and important feature."

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1913.

ANNUAL REPORT JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 125).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the seventh annual report of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia for the year ended June 30, 1913.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 11, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls attention to the fact that at the bottom of the message just read there is a note stating that the report accompanying the message has been sent to the Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to address it for not exceeding 10 minutes respecting a somewhat personal matter which I do not think rises to the dignity of the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to call attention to the fact that a few days since I asked unanimous consent for time in order that I might yield it to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] who desired to address the House. As I say, I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case, but I do give notice that until the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has had an opportunity to address the House in respect to the Caminetti case there will be no more lengthy addresses permitted in the House by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, during my absence in Kentucky I find that one Lamar appeared before a committee of the Senate and stated that he was the author of a resolution which I had introduced before the Committee on Rules of this House, intimating that he was the power behind the throne in inducing me to prosecute under that resolution an investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, although he states that he never saw me or had any direct communication with me in his life. This was a boast made, among a number of others, that he had distributed the stock of the Steel Corporation, and had been philosopher, adviser, and friend to J. Pierpont Morgan, Russell Sage, George R. Keene, and other celebrities.

I think it due to the committee of which I was the chairman, due to myself and to this House, to call attention to the record, which shows for itself how ridiculous is this boast and as well as its absolute falsity. This man states that before sending this resolution to me by some emissary he discussed it with a lawyer named Lauterbach, and that Lauterbach went to Mr. Morgan and to Mr. Steele to notify them that the resolution was about to be introduced; that Mr. Morgan and Mr. Steele and others paid no attention to this threat, and that he then sent this resolution to me by a man named Martin, and that I introduced it.

I read now from page 793 of the record of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, which is investigating the question of the maintenance of a lobby to influence legislation in Washington. Lamar was on the witness stand, and after claiming that he had this resolution introduced, Senator WALSH asked him:

Did Mr. Lauterbach make that statement upon your suggestion?

Referring to the statement that Mr. Lauterbach made to Mr. Morgan and Mr. Steele—

Mr. LAMAR. The resolution had not yet been introduced at that time, Senator. Congressman STANLEY had not yet received it. The resolution had been drawn.

When Mr. Lauterbach was put on the stand and asked about when this occurred, he said, at page 1929:

Senator REED. Now, to get the chronology of this. The first talk you had about this matter was in 1908?

Mr. LAUTERBACH. I am evidently mistaken about it. I could not have had a talk before the resolution was drafted, and I have got the year wrong.

Senator REED Then you had another talk after the resolution was in effect, which must have been some time in 1910 or 1911?

Mr. LAUTERBACH It must have been; yes.

Senator CUMMINS. 1911?

Mr. LAUTERBACH. 1911.

Mr. Speaker, I did introduce a resolution before the Committee on Rules on April 28, 1911, which is the resolution of which this gentleman claims to be the father. That resolution was as follows:

[House resolution 139, Sixty-second Congress, first session.]

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether, since the year of 1897, there have occurred violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, the various interstate-commerce acts, and the acts relative to the national banking associations, which violations have not been prosecuted, dealt with, or lawfully disposed of by the executive officers of the Government; and if any such violations are disclosed said committee is directed to report the facts and circumstances to the House, with bills requiring appropriate action to be taken by such executive officers; and said committee shall also report any further legislation which it may consider advisable for reenforcing the acts of Congress aforesaid and more effectually punishing future violations thereof. Said committee is hereby further specially directed to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, its organization and operations, and if in connection therewith violations of law as aforesaid are disclosed to report the same and a bill requiring action to be taken thereon.

Said committee shall inquire whether said Steel Corporation has had any relations or affiliations tending toward violations of law with the Pennsylvania Steel Co., the Cambria Steel Co., the Lackawanna Steel Co., or any other iron or steel company nominally independent.

Also whether said Steel Corporation through the persons owning its stock or its directors or officers has or has had relations tending toward or aiding in violations of law with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or any other railroad company, coal companies, or with any national banking companies, trust companies, or insurance companies, or other corporate organizations, or companies, or with the stockholders, directors, or other officers of said companies, and whether such relations have caused or have a tendency to cause any of the results following:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition in production or transportation, including conspiracies to crush out and bankrupt competitors.

Second. Excessive capitalization of corporations with large bond and stock issues not representing real values.

Third. Vast combinations of corporations controlled by a few individuals, created by the ownership of one corporation of the stock of other corporations, the securities issued therefor constituting fictitious capitalization.

Fourth. Wide speculations in stocks conducted by conspiracies among associated owners and officers of the various corporations.

Fifth. Private profits through such speculations to managers of the corporations derived at the expense of the stockholders and the public, using corporation money or manipulating corporation power.

Sixth. To cause panics in the bond and stock markets and in the money markets like those of 1903 and 1907.

And to fully report to the House whether by reason of any facts thus ascertained there should be legislation by Congress as contemplated by the first clause of this resolution.

Said committee as a whole or by subcommittee is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The costs and expenses of said committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives. Said expenses shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

These gentlemen overlooked the fact that a year before that, when there were no Democratic Congressmen to see or influence, when Mr. Lauterbach could have had no reason for going to Mr. Steele and promising to see Mr. CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD and others, to have them prevent me from securing the passage of a resolution against the Steel Corporation, when Mr. Cannon was Speaker and Mr. Dalzell was the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I introduced a resolution almost identical with the one of which Lamar claimed to be the author. That resolution is as follows:

(House Resolution 813, Sixty-first Congress, second session, June 20, 1910.)

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members of this House, to be selected, five by the majority and four by the minority, and to be elected by ballot, be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether since the year of 1897 there have occurred violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, the various interstate-commerce acts, and the acts relative to the national banking associations, which violations have not been prosecuted, dealt with, or lawfully disposed of by the executive officers of the Government; and if any such violations are disclosed said committee is directed to report the facts and circumstances to the House with bills requiring appropriate action to be taken by such executive officers, and said committee shall also report any further legislation which it may consider advisable for reenforcing the acts of Congress aforesaid and more effectually punishing future violations thereof. Said committee is hereby further specially directed to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, its organizations and operations, and if in connection therewith violations of law as aforesaid are disclosed to report the same and a bill requiring action to be taken thereon.

Said committee shall inquire whether said Steel Corporation has had any relations or affiliations tending toward violations of law with the Pennsylvania Steel Co., the Cambria Steel Co., the Lackawanna Steel Co., or any other iron or steel company nominally independent.

Also whether said Steel Corporation, through the persons owning its stock or its directors or officers, has or has had relations tending toward or aiding in violations of law with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. or any other railroad company, or with any national banking companies, trust companies, or insurance companies, or with the stockholders, directors, or other officers of said companies, and whether such relations have caused or have a tendency to cause any of the results following:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition in production or transportation, including conspiracies to crush out and bankrupt competitors.

Second. Excessive capitalization of corporations with large bond and stock issues not representing real values.

Third. Vast combinations of corporations controlled by a few individuals, created by the ownership by one corporation of the stock of other corporations, the securities issued therefor constituting fictitious capitalization.

Fourth. Wide speculations in stocks conducted by conspiracies among associated owners and officers of the various corporations.

Fifth. Private profits through such speculations to managers of the corporations, derived at the expense of the stockholders and the public, using corporation money or manipulating corporation power.

Sixth. To cause panics in the bond and stock markets and in the money markets like those of 1903 and 1907.

And to fully report to the House whether, by reason of any facts thus ascertained, there should be legislations by Congress as contemplated by the first clause of this resolution.

Said committee as a whole, or by subcommittee, is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, and more important still, the records will show that this resolution, introduced and referred to the Rules Committee of this House, was the last step taken by myself to call the attention of the Department of Justice to the legal status of the United States Steel Corporation and not the first. Before any resolution of any kind, character, or description was ever introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules touching the Steel Corporation I introduced into this House a resolution similar in purport, differing only in language, covering the same ground, and that resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and is as follows:

(House resolution 732, Sixty-first Congress, second session.)

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 9, 1910.

Mr. STANLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives for its information all facts which show, or tend to show, that there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last 12 months has existed, a combination, agreement, or conspiracy between the Carnegie Steel Co., the Federal Steel Co., the American Tin Plate Co., the National Tube Co., the American Bridge Co., the American Steel & Wire Co., the American Steel Hoop Co., or any of said companies and the United States Steel Corporation or others in violation of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies," or of the interstate-commerce act of 1887 and acts amendatory thereof, or other laws of the United States.

And all facts which show, or tend to show, that the United States Steel Corporation and the other companies, corporations, or copartnerships hereinbefore mentioned, in combination or singly, have, contrary to the laws of the United States in such cases made and provided, interfered or injured, or attempted to interfere with or injure, competition in the iron and steel industry in the United States, and all facts which show, or tend to show, that said companies, acting together or singly, have, contrary to the laws of the United States in such cases made and provided, conspired to increase the cost of iron and steel to consumers, or to deteriorate the quality thereof, or to increase the hours, or to reduce its wages of labor.

And all facts which show, or tend to show, what coal companies, railway transportation companies, banks, and insurance companies, or what officers or directors thereof, have, contrary to the laws of the United States in such cases made and provided, conspired and confederated with said United States Steel Corporation and the other companies hereinbefore mentioned for the purpose of aiding and abetting said United States Steel Corporation and the other said companies engaged in the iron and steel industry in increasing the cost of iron and steel to consumers, or deteriorating the quality thereof, or increasing the hours or decreasing the wage of labor, or the commission of other offenses against the laws of the United States hereinbefore mentioned.

And all other facts which show, or tend to show, the existence of such combination between the United States Steel Corporation and the other said companies engaged in the iron and steel industry contrary to the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or other laws of the United States.

That resolution was submitted months before it was introduced into this House to the present chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Judge CLAYTON, in the spring of 1910, a year and a half before this Lamar claims to have sent any resolution to me—before I ever knew there was such a man as Martin in existence—and I may add that I never heard of Lamar until some time after the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation was in progress.

This resolution was submitted to Judge CLAYTON, who made suggestions and corrections before its introduction in this House. We discussed the legal status of the Steel Corporation. That resolution was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Judge Parker at that time was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. A few days after that, I can not say exactly, I received notice that they would hear me on the resolution. I assumed it would be reported unfavorably without any hearing, to speak very plainly about it. I simply wanted to call the attention of the country to it. Judge Parker advised me that the President of the United States did not regard my resolution favorably. He said he had just heard from Mr. Wickersham, the Attorney General, and Mr. Wickersham thought the resolution should not be favorably reported. I said then to Judge Parker in the presence of the Judiciary Committee, many of whom are present on this floor now, that the Judiciary Committee sat as a court; that this was a question of law, and while they were at liberty to report favorably or unfavorably, just as they chose, nevertheless they should not allow either the President or the Attorney General to govern their discretion in a weighty matter of this kind. Then for over one hour I discussed, without note or memorandum of any kind except the law books kindly furnished me after my arrival at the committee room, my reasons for believing and knowing that the Steel Corporation was operating in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. I analyzed the case of the Northern Securities Co., which is on all fours with the Steel Corporation, both being holding companies engaged in transportation and interstate commerce.

I took the charter of the Northern Securities Co. and the charter of the United States Steel Corporation and showed them where it was impossible for the Northern Securities Co. to be within the Sherman Act and for the Steel Corporation to be exempt from its provisions, a thing that never seems to have occurred to any of these New York people who know so much about the Steel Corporation, but who can never get beyond the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. In addition, I took up the subsidiaries of the Steel Corporation and explained in full every phase of the resolution. When I had spoken for over an hour, Mr. Nye, a Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, arose in his place and stated that while he differed with me in politics, being of the same party as the Attorney General and the President, he believed I had made out my case and that he for one would vote to favorably report my resolution. That resolution was favorably reported, unanimously reported as the record here shows, by the Judiciary Committee before any resolution was ever dreamed or thought of by me or anybody else before the Rules Committee, and I only went before the Rules Committee because the Department of Justice refused to act. Had the Department of Justice moved as it did in the Tobacco case, after the introduction of a similar resolution four or five years previously, the committee authorized by this House to investigate the Steel Corporation would have been unnecessary. I will put in the RECORD the resolution, the result of much labor of Judge CLAYTON, other members of the Judiciary Committee, and myself, and the resolution of which this creature claims to be the author, and I will not take up the time of the House in analyzing it. You will find a slight difference in phraseology, but the purport and purpose of both are identical.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I have not looked over the testimony, but in order that we may make a direct issue with one gentleman who seems to have appeared before the Senate committee and in order that a court of law may hold him if necessary, I desire to ask the gentleman if Mr. Martin told the truth when he said he handed you this resolution supposed to have been prepared by Mr. Lamar?

Mr. STANLEY. After I had gone before the Judiciary Committee Mr. Martin came to my office. He told me that he was secretary of the Anti-Trust League. He gave me the names of quite a number of men who were members of that league, among them Judge Fleming, of Kentucky, an ex-member of the railroad commission and a man of prominence.

I knew Judge Fleming, and I ascertained that that was the truth. He told me that he had been the Democratic nominee for Congress in New York City, which was true. He referred me to Gov. Sulzer, who was then a Member of the House. He spoke of quite a number of Members of Congress who were members of his league, and among them I recall Judge Rucker, of Colorado. In talking with the latter in the cloakroom, he told me that he was a member of this Anti-Trust League, and that the organization was engaged in a most laudable work. Martin offered me quite an amount of information. He brought in a bale of it. He may have brought in a dozen resolutions. All I know is that he brought me no resolution that I introduced.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended, so that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the gentleman has covered pretty well the statement of this man Lamar. I wish to ask him if he has read the testimony of Martin before the Senate committee?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; I have glanced over it. I can not say I have read it all.

Mr. AUSTIN. In that statement Mr. Martin says he brought this resolution from New York to Washington, and that he and you went over it and changed it; and that it was afterwards presented to the House practically as you and Mr. Martin prepared it, or agreed upon it.

Mr. STANLEY. As I stated, this man brought me a vast amount of data. I have no recollection of going over any resolution with Mr. Martin. I am quite sure I did not.

Mr. AUSTIN. And the statement and claim of Mr. Martin that this resolution providing for the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation was inspired by the so-called Anti-Trust League is not true?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly not. I was clamoring for an investigation of the Steel Corporation months before I knew anything about Martin or the Anti-Trust League one way or another, as the record shows.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized for 15 minutes.

BAGOT AND RUSH TREATY.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the centennial celebration at Put-in-Bay last week reminds us that there were warships on the Great Lakes 100 years ago. The War of 1812 was concluded by the treaty of Ghent, signed December 24, 1814. That treaty is well known. It is familiar to every American boy and girl, to every Canadian and British boy and girl, and to the boys and girls who study general history in all lands. But there is another treaty that has had more to do with the preservation of peace which is almost unknown even to those who study history, the Bagot and Rush treaty—at least it is called a treaty now. When it was made it was given the modest designation of "an exchange of notes."

Letters were exchanged during the month of April, 1817, between Charles Bagot, British minister to the United States, and Richard Rush, Acting Secretary of State, in which it was proposed and agreed to that the naval forces of the high contracting parties on the Great Lakes should be reduced. The agreement contained in this "exchange of notes" was ratified by the United States Senate and duly proclaimed by President Monroe April 23, 1818.

NAVAL DISARMAMENT.

Those who favor naval disarmament by international agreement will find here the greatest practical illustration of the wisdom of that policy. For almost a century cities and towns have been permitted to grow up around the Great Lakes—the inland seas—without the least fear of destruction by a "naval force." Think of great cities like Chicago, Detroit, Toronto, and Montreal without the investment of a single dollar for land defenses either in men or forts. Think of what it has meant to business and the peaceful pursuits of these two great countries.

TOO GOOD TO ANNUL.

It is worthy of note that there was a section in this treaty which provided that it might be annulled by either of the high contracting parties by giving six months' notice. In spite of the simple, easy method provided for its annulment it has remained in force for almost a century, has been a blessing to the people of two great nations, and is a powerful argument for naval disarmament the world over. [Applause.]

FULL TEXT OF TREATY.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read in my time the "exchange of notes" and proclamation of President Monroe which constitute this wonderful treaty written by men who lived a century ahead of their time.

The Clerk read as follows:

AGREEMENT EFFECTED BY EXCHANGE OF NOTES CONCERNING NAVAL FORCE ON THE GREAT LAKES—SIGNED AT WASHINGTON APRIL 28-29, 1817; RATIFICATION ADVISED BY THE SENATE APRIL 16, 1818; PROCLAIMED BY THE PRESIDENT APRIL 28, 1818.

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1817.

The undersigned, His Brittannick Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acquaint Mr. Rush that, having laid before His Majesty's Government the correspondence which passed last year between the Secretary of the Department of State and the undersigned upon the subject of a proposal to reduce the naval force of the respective countries upon the American Lakes, he has received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the Government of the United States that His Royal Highness is willing to accede to the proposition made to the undersigned by the Secretary of the Department of State in his note of the 2nd of August last.

His Royal Highness, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, agrees that the naval force to be maintained upon the American Lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side—that is:

On Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burthen and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

On the Upper Lakes, to two vessels not exceeding like burthen each and armed with like force.

On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel not exceeding like burthen and armed with like force.

And His Royal Highness agrees that all other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled and that no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.

His Royal Highness further agrees that if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The undersigned has it in command from His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the American Government that his Royal Highness has issued orders to His Majesty's officers on the Lakes directing that the naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. Rush the assurances of his highest consideration.

CHARLES BAGOT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
April 29, 1817.

The undersigned, Acting Secretary of State, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Bagot's note of the 28th of this month, informing him that, having laid before the Government of His Britannic Majesty the correspondence which passed last year between the Secretary of State and himself upon the subject of a proposal to reduce the naval force of the two countries upon the American Lakes, he had received the commands of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent to inform this Government that His Royal Highness was willing to accede to the proposition made by the Secretary of State in his note of the second of August last.

The undersigned has the honor to express to Mr. Bagot the satisfaction which the President feels at His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's having acceded to the proposition of this Government as contained in the note alluded to. And in further answer to Mr. Bagot's note the undersigned, by direction of the President, has the honor to state that this Government, cherishing the same sentiments expressed in the note of the second of August, agrees that the naval force to be maintained upon the lakes by the United States and Great Britain shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is—

On Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon. On the Upper Lakes, to two vessels not exceeding the like burden each and armed with like force; and on the waters of Lake Champlain to one vessel not exceeding like burden and armed with like force.

And it agrees that all other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled and that no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed. And it further agrees that if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation and should give notice to that effect to the other party it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The undersigned is also directed by the President to state that proper orders will be forthwith issued by this Government to restrict the naval force thus limited to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party.

The undersigned eagerly avails himself of this opportunity to tender to Mr. Bagot the assurances of his distinguished consideration and respect.

RICHARD RUSH.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas an arrangement was entered into at the city of Washington, in the month of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, between Richard Rush, Esquire, at that time acting as Secretary for the Department of State of the United States, for and in behalf of the Government of the United States, and the Right Honorable Charles Bagot, His Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, for and in behalf of His Britannic Majesty, which arrangement is in the words following, to wit:

"The naval force to be maintained upon the American Lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is—

"On Lake Ontario, to one vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden and armed with one eighteen-pound cannon.

"On the Upper Lakes, to two vessels not exceeding like burden each and armed with like force.

"On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel not exceeding like burden and armed with like force.

"All other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled and no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.

"If either party should be hereafter desirous of annulling this stipulation and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

"The naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party"; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States have approved of the said arrangement and recommended that it should be carried into effect, the same having also received the sanction of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Britannic Majesty:

Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States, do by this my proclamation make known and declare that the arrangement aforesaid, and every stipulation thereof, has been duly entered into, concluded, and confirmed, and is of full force and effect.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington this twenty-eighth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen and of the independence of the United States the forty-second.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, more important than the recital of this remarkable treaty is the concrete example of almost a century of naval disarmament upon the great inland seas of the North American Continent. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STRINGER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the present currency and banking measure, and for the further purpose of incorporating in the RECORD an address delivered day before yesterday by the Hon. George M. Reynolds, president of the Continental and Commercial Bank of Chicago, at the Minneapolis Bankers' Convention, held at Duluth, Minn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CURRENCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. STRINGER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the President of the United States appeared in person before this House of Representatives and forcefully, logically, and patriotically urged upon this special session of Congress immediate action in the matter of currency and banking legislation as one of the pressing needs of the hour.

It is perfectly clear—

Said he—

that it is our duty to supply the new banking and currency system the country needs, and it will need it immediately more than it has ever needed it before. We must act now, at whatever sacrifice to ourselves. It is a duty which the circumstances forbid us to postpone. I should be recreant to my deepest convictions of public obligation did I not press it upon you with solemn and urgent insistence.

This urgent insistency on the part of the President was met with universal approbation throughout the entire length and breadth of the country, and the President having therefore done his part in this matter, the people are waiting, patiently and expectantly, for this Congress to likewise do its part.

If a money stringency or industrial depression occur in the near future in this country, it is not going to be due to the provisions contained in the pending tariff bill or the pending bill for currency and banking reform, but because of tardy action on the part of Congress in passing both of these bills without delay and presenting them to the President for his signature.

The President has demanded prompt action. The people have echoed his demand; and long-continued and drawn-out uncertainty in this regard is a thousand times more damaging to industry and enterprise than the prompt passage of this remedial legislation, even though a few immaterial imperfections should be found therein.

Undue haste would, of course, be a blunder, but promptness is not undue haste and useless discussions over immaterial details should not be allowed to hamper and retard the immediate passage of those measures of relief which the exigencies of the situation demand.

Apropos to the pending currency and banking reform measure, under the leave given me by this House I append herewith extracts from an address delivered July 10 at Duluth, Minn., before the Minnesota Bankers' Association by Hon. George M. Reynolds, president of the Continental and Commercial National Bank, of Chicago.

And in this connection I desire to say that Mr. Reynolds is not only an authority in such matters but is a man of the highest probity and integrity, who has always fearlessly championed progressive ideas in the line of banking reforms, and in the formulation and advocacy of his ideas has had in view not the interests of the banking fraternity alone but the interests of the borrowing classes as well, the interests of industrial enterprise, and of the whole country and the whole people.

In part Mr. Reynolds said:

While I hope for the earliest possible enactment of a good currency law, still my great desire in this respect can not, and I feel should not, stifle my convictions as to the soundness and probable efficiency of the plan covered by the bill which has been introduced.

As a result of personal interviews with President Wilson and his administration heads who have been charged with the responsibility of preparing a currency bill, I have been impressed it is the earnest desire of all concerned to devise the best plan which it may be possible to enact into a law. Therefore I believe they will welcome constructive criticism of the bill, for I feel that they, too, will recognize the wisdom of accepting the consensus of opinion of the many rather than to rely upon the knowledge or belief of but a small number.

Assuming that you have read and are somewhat familiar with the bill, and appreciating I could not in the short time allotted to me undertake an exhaustive discussion of its details, I ask your kind indulgence while I call your attention to and discuss briefly four sections of the bill which I regard as comprising its most important special features.

IMPORTANT PARTS OF BILL.

Placed in the order of their importance from the standpoint of principle, as well as in their practical effect, should they be adopted I would group the sections as follows:

First. The one providing for the organization of the Federal reserve board;

Second. That relating to the proposed treatment of the national bank United States bond secured notes;

Third. The note issues; and Fourth. The reserves.

Believing that in the interest of the public welfare the Government should exercise a certain supervision or control over the new system, in a regulatory way, the framers of the bill have provided in it for the creation of a Federal reserve board of seven members, which will include the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, respectively, the four additional to be appointed by the President of the United States.

POLITICAL BOARD.

Inasmuch as the three first named would be members of the President's official family, receiving their office through appointment by him, it will be seen that the entire Federal reserve board would be appointees of the President; and since by the terms of the bill itself not more than one of the directors appointed to serve on that board must be a banker of wide experience, thereby prohibiting the sole owners of the stock from the right of representation, in fact, excluding them from any participation in the deliberations of the board, bankers, business men, and thinking people generally regarded this prohibition as most revolutionary in character and calculated to place our whole system of banking under the domination and control of a purely political board.

The bill as it was introduced provided for retirement of the national bank United States bond-secured notes by giving the national banks the right to present to the Secretary of the Treasury in any one year 5 per cent of the 2 per cent United States bonds now owned by the national banks and held by the Treasury Department to secure their circulating notes now outstanding and receive in lieu thereof an equal amount of 3 per cent United States bonds due after 20 years, the latter to carry no circulation privileges.

In practice this would result in having national banks reduce their circulation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum for 20 years, at the end of which time all national-bank notes would be fully retired from circulation.

SHOULD PROTECT BANKS.

When it is borne in mind that the Government has been the principal beneficiary as a result of the low rate of interest at which these bonds have been floated, because of their required use by national banks as security for their circulating notes, thereby enabling the Government to save millions of dollars on interest annually, I think all fair-minded people will feel that there is an obligation on the part of the Government to protect the banks against loss on the bonds so held.

Careful consideration of this subject since my return from Washington leads me to believe that any plan of currency legislation which is provided for should either employ these bonds upon some basis which will protect the banks from loss, or it should take them up and pay them off or refund them into bonds which will be worth par in a normal market for securities.

CRITICIZES NOTE ISSUE.

The bill also provides for an issue of Federal reserve Treasury notes not to exceed $500,000,000, and in addition thereto a sum equal to the difference between the total amount of national-bank notes outstanding at any given time and the amount of such notes outstanding at the time of the passage of the bill.

It also provides that these notes shall purport on their faces to be the obligations of the United States and shall be issued at the discretion of the Federal reserve board and solely for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks.

If the notes were the obligation of the Federal reserve banks alone, and properly secured, any emergency which could possibly cause a default in the payment of gold would not affect the credit of the Government and would leave it free and unhampered to use its influence and prestige to bring about stability, whereas if the promise of the Government to redeem these notes in gold should be linked with that of the Federal reserve banks and a default should occur, neither would be free to assist the other.

EFFECT IN TIME OF WAR.

In case of war with a foreign nation, making it necessary for the Government to use its credit freely, its guarantee of the payment of these notes in gold would no doubt impair its ability to borrow on the most advantageous basis, and it would at the same time, through so materially increasing its obligations, cause more or less apprehension concerning such outstanding notes, and if a condition should be created through which the public would doubt the ability of the Government to pay gold against these notes, gold would be hoarded and the notes would depreciate in value. Furthermore than this, the manner in which they must be gotten into circulation is unscientific and would have a tendency for inflation, for any plan which does not force immediate automatic redemption of a bank note, once it has served its purpose, is built upon a wrong premise.

NOTE TAXATION WRONG.

We believe that the theory of taxing notes to enforce their redemption is wrong in principle and practice, and as a substitute for this plan and with a view to securing a system which would prevent inflation, we suggested that a Federal reserve bank should issue notes without tax so long as it should maintain a 50 per cent gold reserve against its total liabilities, including deposits, but that such notes as it should have outstanding when its gold reserves would fall below 50 per cent should be taxed at the rate of 1½ per cent for each 2½ per cent its gold reserve should fall under 50 per cent down to 33⅓ per cent. In practice this would mean that a Federal reserve bank would have to pay a tax on its outstanding notes of 1½ per cent when its gold reserve would be 47½ per cent; 6 per cent when its reserve should drop to 40 per cent; and 10½ per cent when its reserve would fall to 33⅓ per cent, it to be prohibited from issuing notes when the reserve would fall below that point.

If a proper system of currency and banking is adopted and there is established in the United States an open market for commercial paper, most of the evils that it is alleged are created through the concentration of capital in the centers will disappear, for the banks of the country are now forced to resort to stock exchange loans, because that is the only avenue through which it is possible for them to secure liquid paper upon which funds can be immediately collected.

The maintenance of a broad, open market for commercial paper and bills of exchange would soon draw to that market the major portion of the money of out-of town banks that has been employed in the carrying of stock-exchange loans; therefore why disturb the reserve relations between banks so violently and without any definite knowledge of what effect it may have on business?

RESERVE SHIFT A MENACE.

I contend this drastic and wholesale shifting of reserves from the natural centers where the requirements of business have caused them to flow automatically will disturb business and greatly impair the ability of the public to secure credit accommodations.

If none of the balances in reserve city banks are to be counted as reserve it naturally follows that in time these balances will be withdrawn; especially so since the plan is so drawn as to encourage the members to do most of their business with the Federal reserve banks. Consequently, we are, I think, justified in the belief that in due time this business would practically be forced into the Federal reserve banks.

CITES CASE OF OWN BANK.

As a concrete case, take my own bank. Under normal conditions we have balances from our correspondents of over $100,000,000. If none of these balances can be counted as reserves by our correspondents and they are forced to carry them with the Federal reserve banks, does it not follow that we may ultimately lose that amount in bank or reserve deposits? We usually carry cash means of 40 per cent of our gross deposits, so that a $100,000,000 deposit gives us a loaning power of $60,000,000. To take away from the banks of Chicago the reserves thus carried by its banks for their correspondents, or $200,000,000, would decrease their loaning ability $120,000,000. In like manner, take away from New York City banks $240,000,000 in deposits of this character and you would reduce the loaning power of the banks of that city $180,000,000.

Add to this the disturbance of business that would be caused by a similar and proportionate shrinkage in the ability of banks in nearly 50 other reserve cities and in country banks to furnish credit to their customers and you will get some idea of the effect this "redistribution" of reserves will have upon general business. We are told that this shrinkage in our loaning power is to be offset by the right of member banks to rediscount with the Federal reserve bank.

Now, if we, in our bank, should carry a continuous line of rediscounts with the Federal reserve bank equal to our capital, we would, in the event we should lose our bank balances, still be obliged to reduce our loans $40,000,000.

CURTAILS BANKING POWER.

Take away the reserves we now carry for our correspondents and you take away our ability to furnish large amounts of money to one borrower. Where, then, will those who require large amounts of money for the conduct of legitimate business go to secure their accommodations?

To my mind this is a subject that concerns the business man much more than it does the banker, especially since, as I have before stated, the effects of whatever changes are made must ultimately fall upon and be borne by the people.

Summarizing, I would recommend the following changes as a means of bringing the plan to a much more workable, as well as a more equitable, basis:

Provide for representation of banks on the Federal reserve board, or for the organization of an advisory board, composed of one member selected by each Federal reserve bank, thus bringing into daily contact with the members of the Federal reserve board men who would be familiar with the banking business and agricultural conditions in each section of the country, thereby insuring a more intelligent discharge of their duties so far as their actions would affect business in the various sections.

WOULD MODIFY RESERVE PLAN.

Modify the section relating to reserves by providing that until the plan has been fully tried out one-third of the reserves that banks in country towns and in reserve cities are required to carry may be carried with reserve correspondents as is now done under the national banking law, leaving the requirement that banks in central reserve cities must carry 20 per cent reserves, one-half of which must be in their vaults and one-half to their credit in the Federal reserve bank.

This would, as I have already stated, decentralize reserves in the centers over one-half and would be much less liable to disturb general business than the drastic and revolutionary shifting of reserves now provided for in the bill.

Later on, say five years after the plan has been in operation, any further shifting of reserves of the banks found to be necessary or desirable could be effected without taking the risk of disturbing business that might follow if the plan proposed is now enforced.

NOTE ISSUE REVISION.

I would also recommend a change in the plan for the issuing of notes. While I think it much preferable that the Federal reserve bank should issue the notes, yet, knowing as I do how determined in their opinion are many who are powerful in the Democratic Party that the Government should issue the notes, I am willing, in view of the fact that the notes are abundantly secured, to yield that point, but even then the limit of the amount that can be issued should be removed and the tax, instead of being on the notes when issued, should be levied only when the Federal reserve bank issuing them should fail to maintain a proper reserve of gold against its liabilities.

In closing Mr. Reynolds said he could not help but feel that the administration has a full conception of the ramifications of the power the bill vests in the Federal reserve board, and said he hoped that in the desire of Congress to enact the best possible legislation it will clearly see the necessity for modifying the bill in two or three sections with a view of so harmonizing the situation that the banks not only will be willing to enter the system, but that they will do so enthusiastically, and on that cooperative basis so necessary for the success of the plan and the future welfare of the country.

ADJOURNMENT.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 2739) to create a waterways commission and a board of river regulation to promote interstate commerce by the development and improvement of the rivers and waterways and water resources of the United States and the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes, and by providing a fund for the regulation and control of the flow of rivers and for the maintenance at all seasons of a navigable stage of water in waterways and for the connection of rivers and waterways with the Great Lakes and with each other, and as a means to that end to provide for flood prevention and protection, and for water storage, and for the beneficial use of flood waters for irrigation and water power, and for the conservation and use of water in agriculture, and for the protection of watersheds from denudation and erosion, and from forest fires, and for the cooperation in such work of Government services and bureaus with each other and with States, municipalities, and for local agencies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BURTON. The question of the reference of a similar bill came up at the last Congress. I think it should go to the Committee on Commerce. Clearly that is where it belongs.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall contend that the bill should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but I know that there will be debate upon that subject, and I ask that the bill be printed and lie on the table at present, until a proper reference can be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 2739) to create a waterways commission and a board of river regulation to promote interstate commerce by the development and improvement of the rivers and waterways and water resources of the United States and the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes, and by providing a fund for the regulation and control of the flow of rivers and for the maintenance at all seasons of a navigable stage of water in waterways and for the connection of rivers and waterways with the Great Lakes and with each other, and as a means to that end to provide for flood prevention and protection and for water storage and for the beneficial use of flood waters for irrigation and water power, and for the conservation and use of water in agriculture, and for the protection of watersheds from denudation and erosion and from forest fires, and for the cooperation in such work of Government services and bureaus with each other and with States, municipalities, and other local agencies.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $60,000,000 annually for each of the 10 years following the first day of July, 1913, is hereby reserved, set aside, and appropriated, and made available until expended, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the river regulation fund, to be used to promote interstate commerce by the development and improvement of the rivers and waterways of the United States and their connections with the Great Lakes and with each other, and by the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes and transportation, and the establishment and maintenance of adequate terminal and transfer facilities and systems and their maintenance, improvement, and protection, and by the making of examinations and surveys and by the construction of engineering and other works and projects for the regulation and control of the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and the standardization of such flow, and by the maintenance of navigable stages of water at all seasons of the year in the waterways of the United States, and by preventing silt and sedimentary material from being carried into and deposited in waterways, channels, and harbors, and by the conservation, development, and utilization of the water resources of the United States, and by flood prevention and protection through the establishment, construction, and maintenance of natural and artificial reservoirs for water storage and control, and the protection of watersheds from denudation, erosion, and surface wash, and from forest fires, and the maintenance and extension of woodland and other protective cover thereon, and the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands and arid lands, and the building of drainage and irrigation works in order that the flow of rivers shall be regulated and controlled not only through the use of flood waters for irrigation on the upper tributaries, but also through controlling them in fixed and established channels in the lower valleys and plains, and by doing all things necessary to provide for any and all beneficial uses of water that will contribute to its conservation or storage in the ground or in surface reservoirs as an aid to the regulation or control of the flow of rivers, and by acquiring, holding, using, and transferring lands and any other property that may be needed for the aforesaid purposes, and by doing such other things as may be specified in this act or necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes thereof, and by securing the cooperation therein of States, municipalities, and other local agencies, as hereinafter set forth, and for the payment of all expenditures provided for in this act; the ultimate purpose of this act being the maintenance at all times of a navigable stage of water in all inland waterways, and flood prevention and protection, and river regulation and the control of the volume of water forming the stage of the river from its sources, so as to standardize the river flow, as contradistinguished from and supplemental to channel improvement as heretofore undertaken and provided for under the various acts commonly known as river and harbor acts.

CREATION OF THE WATERWAYS COMMISSION AND THE BOARD OF RIVER REGULATION.

SEC. 2. That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the waterways commission, consisting of the President of the United States, who shall be the chairman of said commission, with the power of veto, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the chairman of the board of river regulation, to be appointed as hereinafter provided. Whenever, in their judgment, it may be advisable, in order to expedite construction, the waterways commission may order such construction work as they may determine to be done under the immediate direction, by contract or otherwise, of the executive committee, in which case such work shall be paid for from the apportionment of the service or bureau or organization under which it would otherwise have been done, such transfer and application of any apportionment made by this act being hereby authorized.

The waterways commission shall further have power to temporarily provide for disbursements under this act, other than those above provided for, by transfers from one apportionment hereunder to another: Provided, however, That such transfers shall be equalized and the money so diverted restored to the apportionment from which it was transferred, as nearly as may be, within the period of 10 years covered by this act.

The waterways commission may, if at any time it shall be in their judgment advisable, appoint from the public service additional members of the board of river regulation; and they may also create and appoint from the public service the members of subordinate boards or commissions to promote the purposes of this act and expedite and facilitate the administration thereof and operations and construction thereunder.

He shall construct, operate, and maintain, until otherwise provided by law, such irrigation and drainage works and systems as the board may determine are needed for the regulation of the streams and rivers and the improvement of agricultural conditions, or for the proper control, disposition, and utilization of sewage or other waste waters which without such regulation would pollute the streams or injuriously affect the health or prosperity of the community. He shall also present to the board proposed plans for cooperation with irrigation or drainage projects or enterprises constructed, initiated, or contemplated by States, districts, municipalities, corporations, associations, or individuals, and shall negotiate agreements for coordinating and making more useful works already in existence or proposed through their incorporation into more effective systems.

such as are made by this act for work and improvements to be performed or maintained by the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, but that all work prescribed under this section shall be supplemental to and coordinated with the work as specifically prescribed by Congress in other acts.

DUTIES OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY THE PRESIDENT.

SEC. 17. That it shall be the duty of the members of the board of river regulation appointed by the President and constituting the executive committee of the board of river regulation, as hereinbefore provided, under the direction of the chairman of the board to consider, prepare, and present to the board comprehensive plans providing for the best utilization of the water resources of the United States in connection with river regulation, flood prevention and protection, and the increase of the flow of rivers in low-water seasons and the maintenance at all times of a navigable stage of water in the waterways of the United States, and providing also for the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes of transportation, and the establishment, maintenance, and protection of terminals and transfer sites and facilities for transshipment between rail and water routes, and to adjust all the plans contemplated for the projects constructed under this act to the ultimate purpose of regulating and standardizing the flow of the rivers and inland waterways of the United States, in aid of interstate commerce as aforesaid; and further to give expert advice to the board in its consideration of details, problems, and projects; and it shall be their special duty to constantly promote and stimulate harmonious and effective cooperation between the different bureaus and services of the National Government and between the Nation and States, municipalities, and other local agencies in working out constructive plans under this act; and it shall further be their duty to examine and study the plans presented to the board for consideration, with the view of promoting the fullest possible measure of efficiency and economy in administration and construction, and avoiding all duplication in the work of the respective bureaus.

EQUITABLE APPORTIONMENT AMONG WATERWAY SYSTEMS.

Not less than $10,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the territory included in the drainage basins of the Missouri River and other rivers, bayous, and waterways flowing into the Mississippi River from the west below St. Louis or flowing or debouching directly or through connecting waterways into the Gulf of Mexico west of the Atchafalaya River.

Not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the territory including the drainage basin of the Colorado River, and extending on the west to the crest of the watersheds draining into the Pacific Ocean, and on the north to the drainage basin of the Columbia and Snake Rivers; not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years to the drainage basins of the rivers flowing through or into the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys or into the Pacific Ocean in California; and not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years to the drainage basins of the Columbia and Snake Rivers and other rivers flowing into the Pacific Ocean in Oregon and Washington.

The drainage basin of every river above mentioned shall be understood to include all the tributaries and source streams of such rivers.

REPLENISHMENT OF RIVER REGULATION FUND BY BOND ISSUE.

SEC. 19. That the President is authorized, whenever the current revenues are insufficient to provide the $60,000,000 annually appropriated for the river regulation fund, to make up the deficiency in such fund by the issue and sale of United States bonds, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and running for a period not exceeding 30 years.

A bill (S. 2756) to repeal section 20 of the act entitled "An act to amend the national banking laws," approved May 30, 1908.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In connection with the bill I beg leave to state that its object is to have a bill pending which possibly may be taken advantage of in case a reform can not be made at this session in the banking and currency laws of the country. I desire to call attention to the fact that section 20 of the act approved May 30, 1908, known as the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency bill, provides as follows:

That this act shall expire by limitation on the 30th day of June, 1914.

In case no currency bill should be passed at the present session of Congress, I shall make an effort to have that section repealed, so that if any money stringency develops it may be relieved as provided by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AMENDMENTS TO THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for Schedule K—wool and manufactures of wool—of House bill 3321—the tariff bill—which I ask be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

CAUCUS ACTION ON THE TARIFF.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD extracts from a press dispatch concerning the action of the Democratic caucus on the tariff, including my personal comment.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator repeat his suggestion? We could not hear him on this side.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a brief statement which I made regarding the action of the caucus on the tariff.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I could not hear what the statement was about.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a brief statement which was published in the newspapers regarding the caucus action on the tariff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the request that it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement was not delivered here, of course?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon of the Senator from Nevada, but I did not hear his request.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask leave to print in the RECORD a brief statement which was published in the press, including comment made by myself, regarding the caucus action on the tariff.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLAIM 49 VOTES FOR THE TARIFF BILL IN SENATE—CAUCUS OF DEMOCRATIC SENATORS FAILS TO PASS BINDING RESOLUTION, MANY MEMBERS BEING OPPOSED—STATEMENT OF NEWLANDS.

WASHINGTON, July 7.

Forty-seven Democratic Senators stood up in the party caucus, one by one, late to-day and declared their intention to vote for the Underwood-Simmons tariff revision bill as finally approved by the caucus a few minutes previously. Two Senators, RANSDELL and THORNTON, of Louisiana, stated that they would not make such promise because of the proposal to place sugar on the free list in 1916. Senators HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, and CULBERSON, of Texas, were absent, but both are known to be in favor of the bill. This gives the Democrats 49 votes for the bill, or a slender majority of 1, with the vote of the Vice President to fall back on in an emergency. An absolutely binding resolution was not adopted, the poll by individuals being substituted, and that poll was put only on the ground of personal promise and was not made binding. A resolution was adopted, however, declaring the Underwood-Simmons bill a party measure, and urging its undivided support without amendment, unless such should be submitted by the committee. Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, cast the only vote against this resolution, but Senators SHAFROTH, of Colorado, RANSDELL, and THORNTON did not vote.

TEXT OF RESOLUTION.

The resolution was as follows:

"Resolved, That the tariff bill agreed to by this conference in its amended form is declared to be a party measure, and we urge its undivided support as a duty by Democratic Senators without amendment: Provided, however, That the conference of the Finance Committee may, after reference or otherwise, propose amendments to the bill."

* * * * * * *

STATEMENT BY NEWLANDS.

Senator KERN made public the resolution and a statement regarding the roll call. Senator NEWLANDS, in a statement explaining his position, gave evidence of his intention to stand by the party.

"I voted against making the bill a party measure," Senator NEWLANDS said, "because, while it is superior to the existing tariff, it has certain defects which should be remedied. It discriminates against far western products. The reductions should be apportioned over a period of three years instead of taking effect immediately. Further reductions on a sliding scale should be provided for, particularly on food products and clothing. There should be a tariff board with power to ascertain facts, make recommendations to Congress, and make further reductions under a rule established by Congress.

"Whilst our duties on sugar and wool should be materially reduced, we should not take the risk, by precipitate action, of readjusting injuriously the sugar industry in our insular possessions or of checking the beet-sugar development or the wool industry of the far West. Such action is likely to make us dependent upon foreign countries and ultimately raise the price of both sugar and wool.

WOULD NOT BE BOUND.

"I am opposed to the binding obligation of a caucus, and so voted; but I believe in party responsibility, and while I have protested against going too far in some directions and not going far enough in others, I can foresee no contingency which will separate me from my party associates in legislative action. I trust that during the coming period of protracted debate, the Democrats will in conference improve the bill in the particulars referred to, and I shall use every effort in that direction."

Before final action on the bill the caucus gave concessions to the Senators from woolgrowing States by adopting an amendment making effective a provision for free raw wool on December 1, 1913, and the rates on manufactures of wool January 1, 1914. Earlier in the day the Finance Committee had voted to recommend the dates as October 1 and December 1, respectively, but the caucus voted for the further delay.

This action completed the revision of the Underwood bill, which has occupied the Finance Committee majority and the caucus since May 7.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document (S. Doc. No. 131) an address delivered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] at the third annual convention of the International Association of Casualty and Surety Underwriters on the economic value and social justice of a compulsory and exclusive workmen's compensation law. I will state that it discusses quite exhaustively the substance of a bill that is now before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In connection with the address, and as a public document (S. Doc. No. 132), I ask to have printed some statistics on the subject prepared by Mr. Wills, who is the assistant grand chief engineer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. The statistics cover the whole subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it short?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Oregon. I did not hear what is the subject of the statistics.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The workings under a compensation law substantially as the bill now pending in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Statistics prepared by whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. By Mr. H. E. Wills, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon whether in the matter which he proposes to print there is included a copy of the bill now pending in the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. ROOT. I think it would be very useful to have a copy of the bill printed with the address of the Senator from Utah. I trust that that may be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. With the remarks of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROOT. That a copy of the pending bill be printed, together with the address of the Senator from Utah and the statistics.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I myself think it would be a good plan. I ask the Senator from Utah for his opinion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The remarks which the Senator from Oregon has asked to have printed are addressed to the general subject of workmen's compensation. They do not deal specifically with the bill. The remarks deal specifically with the question of the law being made compulsory and exclusive in character. The statistics to which the Senator calls attention were prepared by Mr. Wills under this very bill.

Mr. ROOT. That is what I supposed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In connection with the statistics it might be very well to print the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then I ask that the bill the Senator from New York speaks of may be printed along with the statistics furnished by Mr. Wills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It will be very well to print the bill in connection with the figures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that action will be taken.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday, July 21, at the termination of the routine morning business, I shall expect to address the Senate on the pending tariff bill.

RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I find on the desk a letter from the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of the Senate of May 1 asking for the employment of retired Army officers. I remember when the resolution was offered, the purpose being, it was alleged, to ascertain whether Army officers resigned and went into the employment of corporations who are doing business with the Government.

The report as it appears gives the Senate no information except as to the number of Army officers who are employed, and states nothing as to what their employment is or what their compensation is. I think it is practically of no value. If the resolution was worth considering at all, we ought to have had information that would enable us to determine whether or not these retired officers are engaged in business that is questionable as to its propriety.

It seems to me that when an officer is retired and subject to orders from the Government the Secretary of War ought to know where he is and what he is doing, and that is what Congress wanted to know. We are providing money every year for these retired Army officers under the assumption that they are incapable of earning a living after they leave the Army. I should like to know personally whether these men are now employed in a capacity that enables them to earn large returns for corporations because of their former connection with the Government. That was the object of the resolution. It has not been accomplished apparently.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

House concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 30,000 copies of the bill H. R. 3321, with amendments, as reported in the Senate July 11, 1913, 20,000 copies for the use of the House and 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave notice at the last meeting that this morning after the close of the morning business I would discuss one feature of the tariff bill, and with the consent of the Senate, on account of the necessity of my absence for a short while, I desire to ask the privilege of going on at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will preface my remarks by a table which I have prepared, showing a comparison of the proposed rates of duty on agricultural products with the present law, giving the rate under the tariff act of 1909, the rate of this proposed bill, and the per cent of decrease. A glance at this table will show that practically every article or product of any importance coming from the hands of a northern farmer is placed upon the free list.

I will ask that the table be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed, as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for more than two months, behind carefully guarded doors and shaded windows, the Democratic members of the Finance Committee have been hatching a tariff measure. They have tenderly shielded it from the too chilling blasts of cold reason and from the too dazzling light of information.

Finally, this unnatural, incubated thing has been brought forth. It has been exhibited to the majority side of the Senate. That majority has viewed it for some time curiously rather than critically, has been unable to say what it is, and by a unanimous vote has determined to take no chance with its conscience in attempting to find out.

It seems to have been conceived in animosity against every American industry that really needed protection—the many small concerns of the country, the only competitors of the great concerns that need no legislative favors. While it bears the birthmark of ill will against nearly all, the special object of its choler and hate is the American farmer. It is especially endowed with tooth and talon for his injury and destruction.

Before that incubating committee he seems to have had no friend. Every hand was raised against him, and with a malevolence devoid of one single element of mercy this monster, cloaked under the deceptive name of a tariff-reform measure, is to be turned loose to prey on his vitals. But though he has been condemned without a hearing by your committee, he will not be friendless in this Chamber nor slaughtered without as earnest a defense as I am able to make for him.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY VERSUS AMERICAN FARMER.

And so I shall address myself first to you, the Democratic Party, with reference to your assault upon the American farmer. In this year 1913 you are about to commit a greater crime against the American farmer than has ever been perpetrated by any political party against any class of people during any period of recorded history. You are about to rob him of sacred rights which he has paid for through long years of toil, self-denial, and patient waiting. With violent hands you are about to strip him of every advantage which the changed conditions of home supply and demand were about to yield him.

You have declared that he is an outcast in the land which he has made, the only one of all the classes of American people who is not entitled to any consideration at your hands. You have insulted his sense of fairness, slapped him in the face, and kicked him into the gutter.

I may not ultimately save him, but I am going to lift him out of this gutter and place him upon the plane of his inherent rights for a moment, and allow him to face you and compel you to face him, and then I am going to put a few questions to you for him.

My first question is, What crime has the American farmer committed against the Democratic Party that has awakened in the heart of that party this dire vengeance against him? Is it because of his past political affiliation that you are heaping upon him the vengeance for all your previous defeats? Or do you consider yourself to be the instrument through which Providence is to work its punishment because in the last political campaign he forgot the faith of his fathers and went chasing after a strange god, with cloven hoofs and branching antlers? If he is to be punished for this heresy, are you the proper person to inflict the punishment? You, at least, who have benefited by his action and hold the power you now enjoy through it, ought to be the last one to strike the blow.

Many of his kind trusted you, voted for you, allowed themselves to be deceived by you. They knew they were not rich, and you always claimed you were the poor man's friend. I am not denying your claim that you like the poor man, for I well know that your political policies have made more poor men in this country than any other policy under the sun.

But you are the beneficiary of the farmer's infidelity to his own party last fall. And for you to now be his executioner for the offense of being misled by you strikes me as being one of the most cold-blooded propositions I have ever heard of.

You told him on the stump that he had been greatly wronged by President Taft, because that President sought to trade off his protection for reciprocal tariff reductions by Canada, and you said that showed the Republican Party was not to be trusted, but that you could be trusted to take care of his interest, and you are proceeding to take care of it in this bill.

The reciprocity proposition had at least the one virtue that it proposed to get something for surrendering something. You, on the other hand, trade away the farmer's interest in everything for absolutely nothing. The reciprocity proposition subjected the farmer to the free competition of Canada only. You subject him to the competition of the whole world—all of Canada, Australia, Venezuela, Argentina, Cuba, the Philippines, and every other country on the face of the earth that may want to dump its products into a market that belongs of right to the American farmer.

You had him in the slough of depression during all of your last administration, from 1893 to 1897. You saw him working himself out of that mire and just beginning to reach a degree of prosperity to which he was justly entitled. You behold the farmer by close frugality and economy just getting his head and shoulders out of the muck of this depression, out of the everlasting debts and into the sunshine of prosperity, and it seems to afflict you with a fit of madness, and with the swift and deadly stroke of your tariff bludgeon you strike him down.

If your assault upon the farmer were the result of impulsive brain storm or uncontrollable frenzy, you might ask the usual verdict in such cases; but his innocence of and freedom from responsibility for either the high cost of living or the cost of high living of which you and the rest of the population are complaining are so clearly established that you can not fail to know it. You admit that your bill will injure him, and you say you intend to do so. You say he is receiving too much for his products, and you intend to compel him to sell them cheaper. By no system of logic can any of you escape that charge. If, as some of you declare, the present tariff protection does not enhance the value of the farmer's products, then you know that taking it off will not diminish the price of farm products, and you know that your claim that you are going to benefit the consumer is false and demagogic in the extreme. Not only this, but you know, if you have given the subject the slightest consideration, that the removal of protection on his products will injure him without benefiting in any degree the ultimate consumer.

RIGHT TO EQUAL CONSIDERATION.

Let me ask you another question: Is not the American farmer equal in intelligence to the American stonecutter, bricklayer, carpenter, or plasterer? Are not his rights to favorable legislation equal to the rights of these other laborers? You enact laws that this plasterer shall in no case be allowed to labor more than 8 hours in a day, and you will punish anyone who will allow him to work 8¼ hours. Do you favor legislation that will allow the farmer sufficient profit in his business that he and his sons can make a living on an 8-hour labor basis? Not by any means. You want to keep down the price the farmer receives for his products. You want to compel him to continue to work 16 hours a day for an average of one-fourth of what the bricklayer receives for his work of 8 hours. You know that the farmer has to work 16 hours a day, that his wife and children have to labor 16 hours a day, and that all they get for it is their board and clothing; and now you propose to reduce his earnings so that he will have to cut down on the clothing, and you say that he must do this so that your 8-hour-a-day plasterer can get cheaper meat, flour, and potatoes. Why do you not say to the laborer, "You must reduce your wages and work longer hours so that the farmer can buy cheaper clothing"? Your answer is: Labor is organized into a great federation, the head of which appears before our committees, tells us what organized labor demands, sits in our galleries, and checks our votes, and we are truly afraid of him. The farmer is not organized; his interests are so scattered and the character of his products so diversified that he has been unable to organize a great national political society, and so you are not much afraid of him. Then, too, you say you may be able to fool him with the claim that protection does not protect him. Well, you may yourselves get fooled in that. The last administration tried that idea in the reciprocity pact, and it got its answer, and you will get yours the first opportunity he has to give it to you.

Your bricklayer receives from 60 to 80 cents per hour. Your farmer does not earn that much on the average for a whole day. If he and his family should receive 10 cents per hour for each hour of hard labor which they perform, he would be twice as prosperous as he is to-day. You know as well as I do that the good wife of the farmer, who labors from 6 a. m. to 10 p. m., does not receive for that service one-half of what your colored woman cook receives, and she gets no Wednesday and Sunday afternoons off.

But admitting this, you say: "The farmer lives more frugally than the laborer of the city. He has not as expensive habits. He does not dress as well. His opportunities to spend money for the little extravagances of life are not so great. He does not smoke 10-cent cigars; it is a pipe or nothing."

Mr. President, I want to protest right here with all the earnestness in my power against the assumption which seems to prevail everywhere that the tiller of the soil is not expected to live on a plane of equality with the average person engaged in city avocations, that he is not expected to clothe himself or his family with equally expensive fabrics. Why on earth should the farmer be forced to be more frugal or more economical than those who live within the confines of a city? The line that marks the boundary between city and country limits is not a line of demarcation between either human intelligence or human rights. Does the Democratic majority of the Senate concur in the sentiment that seems everywhere prevalent among city people, that the Almighty never intended that the tiller of the soil should have more than a mere existence, that his purpose in the world is simply to produce food for others to eat, for which economic arrangement he is to be accorded the right to live in a humble way—a honey bee to be hived and tolerated that drones may have honey to live on?

In all lines of business outside of farming the laborer must receive his wages. Neither frost, hail, blight, nor bug can affect him. The farmer, on the other hand, will lose at least a full crop once in 10 years, and will have many half crops during that period. Everyone acquainted with farm earnings and income knows that the labor of the farmer has always been the poorest paid labor in the United States; that the thing which the farmer sells always has represented and still represents twice as much expended energy in its production as the thing which he buys with it; that measured by the amount of labor expended in producing them, food products as they leave the farmer's hands always have been and are to-day cheaper than any other products in the world; that it takes less expended energy on the part of even the poorest priced laborer in the city to buy a loaf of bread than it does of the farmer to produce the wheat that makes that loaf of bread. Why, then, do you want to further discriminate against the farmer?

Thousands of farmers in my State last year lost half of their crop because of their inability to get labor to care for it. They were unable to get the labor because the prices for that labor in the city are so much higher than the farmer can afford to pay and the hours so much shorter than on the farm that the laborer can not be induced to go to the farm. If you could have seen the frantic efforts of farmers to save their crops, which meant their year's labor, before the winter was on, offering as high as four or five dollars a day for labor, you would appreciate more than I think you do the wrong you are doing them when you by legislation further reduce the price of their products for the benefit of the ultimate consumer.

I present these comparisons, Mr. President, between the labor in the country and the city that I may bring to your attention the rank injustice you are doing to a class that are already discriminated against by your laws. At the present price of farm land, with the present price of farm labor, if the farmer had to hire all his work done, there is not one of them who could make the produce of the farm pay for the labor expended.

Here is a table of cost of operating a farm where all the work is done by hired labor. It was furnished me by a farmer who has for years been a close student of agricultural economics. I think he has allowed $50 per month to the farmer as manager and overseer and $20 per month to his wife in the computation which I present:

Cost of production of wheat on a farm of 640 acres in North Dakota.

VALUE OF FARM, MACHINERY, AND HORSES.

Cost of farm, 640 acres, at $50 per acre	$32,000.00
Cost of farm implements	1,616.00
Farm horses	2,400.00
Total investment	36,016.00

EXPENSES.

Seed grain, labor	5,831.00
Interest on investment at 6 per cent	2,160.96
Taxes and depreciation in value of implements and horses	460.08
Total expenses	8,452.04

PROCEEDS.

8,320 bushels of wheat, at 90 cents per bushel	7,488.00
Loss to farmer	964.04

Observe, at 90 cents per bushel this farmer is $964 in debt at the end of the year. How would he balance at the end of the year with wheat selling at 60 and 65 cents per bushel, as it was selling for last fall? In this table he has made no allowance for loss of crop by hail or drought or any partial loss; no allowance for depreciation of soil qualities. I am myself the owner of some farming land that I am unable to work at all because the cost of labor would be greater than the proceeds of the crop.

The farmer does live. He does not ordinarily run behind, as indicated in this table. Why? Because the table is based upon an assumption that he is to receive wages and that his wife is to receive wages. He is denied the hundreds of little luxuries that the ordinary man of the city avocations indulges in, and he is able to exist.

FARMER VERSUS BUSINESS MAN.

I notice, Mr. President, that whenever you try to arrive at what is reasonable compensation for the manufacturer you start in with capital invested in his business, the interest he has to pay on this capital as a charge against him. Then you compute all his labor and taxes and overhead charges. Against this you estimate the value of all he produces, and you then strike a balance, and you say he should have a reasonable profit above this expense. You even allow for the bonded indebtedness, which is often the full value of the property. Why not treat the farmer the same way?

A farm ought to pay interest on the investment and, in addition, a reasonable profit, after paying for all the labor used on it. But, Mr. President, there is not a grain farm in the United States that will do it.

LEGISLATION AGAINST FARMING INTEREST.

You say it is a crime to make one man's business profitable at the expense of another, and yet, with that cry reverberating throughout the country by legislating shorter hours in city employment we have necessarily legislated against the farmer's interest. The American farmer is both an employer and an employee. He not only manages his own business, but he performs the labor in that business. If he hires laborers outside of his family to till the soil, he and his boys work side by side with those laborers. And if the laborer whom he employs is from the city and objects to doing a farmer's day's work, he and his sons continue to labor several hours after this city gentleman has quit.

By legislation limiting the hours of labor in city employment, while leaving the farm laborer to cope with whatever farm conditions require, you say to this laborer: "Leave the farm; do not you see the farmer is trying to make you do just as much work as he himself does? Go back to the city. We will not allow your employer there to treat you so. If he even requests you to work 8 hours and 3 minutes we will punish him." The farmer says to you: "Why are you driving my laborers from my field? You know I can not run my farm and make a living on an 8-hour system, and you know I can not lure men away from an 8-hour system into a 14 or 16 hour system without raising the hire to a point where I can not afford to use it. I am making no complaint against your 8-hour custom in the cities. If the health and happiness of the people are better for the shortened hours and the Saturday half-holiday, I shall make no complaint on the ground that the conditions of agricultural life are such and the profit of agricultural avocations are so meager that I can not be included within the short-hour system. But if your city laborer drops his working tools at 4 o'clock in the afternoon while I am compelled to labor on in the hot sun for four hours longer and in the twilight and darkness for another two hours; if, after he is resting or visiting all of Saturday afternoon, I must still put in every hour of that day; if I am compelled to pay a greater price for the things I purchase because of a diminished supply due to decreased hours of labor; if I, the laborer on the farm, must so toil and suffer for the benefit of the city laborer and for the benefit of city avocations, for Heaven's sake do not further discriminate against me. The very least you can say to me is: 'Here is our American market, and so long as we discriminate against you in the matter of labor we will at least give you first chance in that market.'"

But your ears are closed to every appeal for justice for the tiller of the soil. You are reaching a point where your income is unable to keep pace with your extravagances, and you are asking the farmer to make good the deficit by reducing the price of his products. It never occurs to you that the proper place to begin economy is on the luxuries, the unnecessaries of life. You declare to him that the American people are paying $1,500,000,000 a year for meat, and you say that is too much. He answers, "They are also paying $2,000,000,000 a year for liquors. Cut you liquor bill half and you will save enough to buy all your meat." You declare they are paying $435,000,000 a year for flour. He replies, "They are paying $800,000,000 for tobacco. Cut your tobacco bill half and your flour is free." You declare they are paying $225,000,000 a year for potatoes. He replies, "They are paying $500,000,000 for theaters and amusements. Cut your amusements half and your potatoes are free." You declare they are paying $300,000,000 a year for butter and eggs. He replies, "They are spending $500,000,000 a year for confectionery." His replies are unanswerable. They are so many monuments reading in clear black letters into your eyes an indictment of your own criminal extravagances and high living.

Then he puts some questions directly to you: At the highest value I have received for my products during the last 10 years, the most prosperous in American history, and placing my labor on a par with the lowest paid labor in the city, has there ever been a day when it did not require more labor on my part to produce the wheat for a loaf of bread than on the part of the purchaser of that loaf to pay for it; more labor on my part to produce a bushel of potatoes than on the part of that laborer to purchase it; more labor to produce a pound of meat than on the part of the laborer to pay for it? To each of these questions—and there are many other questions directed specifically toward his products—you are compelled to answer: No; there has never been such a time. Then, if there has never been such a time, upon what principle of justice are you asking me to further reduce the price of my products and further add to the enormous disadvantage under which I am now laboring? You are compelled to answer, It is upon no principle of justice we are doing this. It is an injustice, induced by political exigencies. Less than one-third of the people of the United States are engaged in agricultural pursuits. The other two-thirds want cheaper food. We have promised to make food cheaper for them, and two-thirds have a greater voting power than one-third. You have just got to suffer for the cause of democracy, that is all.

FARMERS' AND CONSUMERS' PRICES.

Mr. President, injuring one man for the benefit of another is bad enough, but inflicting upon him an injury without any corresponding benefit to anyone else makes that which before was bad now criminal. If the ultimate consumer of farm products were to receive any real, substantial benefit, you might have a grain of excuse for your legislation against the farmer. But he will get no benefit whatever. If prices to the ultimate consumer go down, it will be because of general stagnation in business which always depresses prices, and not because you have compelled the farmer to reduce his prices to the lowest of the world's prices.

With a tariff of 25 cents a bushel on wheat the American price during the past 10 years has averaged from 10 to 12 cents a bushel above the Canadian price at corresponding markets. In other words, the Canadian exporter has paid about half of the tariff, the American miller the other half, and the American farmer has received a benefit in the increased value of his wheat crop of from 10 to 12 cents per bushel. You now propose to take away that benefit. You will, of course, injure him, but will you thereby help the ultimate consumer?

Mr. President, a reduction of 10 cents a bushel on wheat will have no influence whatever upon the retail price of flour. The reduction bears such a small ratio to the value of a barrel of flour that it scarcely affects the wholesale price at all and is entirely lost sight of in the retail trade. The price of wheat fluctuates from day to day, and from month to month there is often a variation all the way from 10 to 15 cents per bushel, while the wholesale price of flour will remain stationary. There is never any change in the retail price until there has been a great and decisive change in the price of grain and the higher or the lower price of grain has become to a degree permanent.

But suppose that by a 25 cents per bushel tariff on wheat the farmer does get 10 cents a bushel better price for his wheat, as has been demonstrated in the last 10 years. And suppose that this extra price of 10 cents a bushel is charged up to the ultimate consumer. The ultimate consumer uses about a barrel of flour per capita a year. That would increase the cost of a barrel of flour and make an added expense of 45 cents a year—3¾ cents a month. The ultimate consumer man would have to retrench in his expenses to meet this extra outlay to the extent of two-thirds of a 5-cent cigar a month. The ultimate consumer girl would have to retrench in her expenses 3 sticks of chewing gum per month. What an enormous burden this tax is upon the people who smoke and chew gum from 4 o'clock on, while the farmer is sweating in the field and worrying over reports of frost, hot winds, hail, noxious weeds, smut, chinch bugs, and grasshoppers.

But you say the people want cheaper bread. You know this reduction will not reduce the price of a loaf of bread a penny. What the people want is not cheaper bread but a better opportunity to earn good wages to buy that bread, and your proposed tariff measure will decrease that opportunity.

Very little bread is to-day made at home in the cities. The cost of fuel to bake it scarcely justifies the expense of home-made bread. Would a reduction of 10 cents a bushel on wheat affect the retail cost of your bread? Let us see: In 1894 and 1895, when the farmer in my State was receiving from 35 to 40 cents a bushel for his wheat, you were paying 5 cents for a loaf of bread made from that wheat. In 1910, when the farmer in my State was receiving a dollar a bushel for his wheat, you still paid the same nickel for your loaf of bread. If an advance of over 50 cents a bushel, an increase of 100 per cent, on wheat has not raised the price of your bread, how do you expect to reduce it by reducing the price of wheat to the extent of 10 cents a bushel by taking away the farmer's protection? Wherein will your ultimate consumer be benefited? The 10 cents per bushel has not injured and will not injure the ultimate consumer of flour and bread, but it may make all the difference in the world to the overworked, underpaid farmer. It may make the difference between a meager profit and a heavy loss. The only persons who will be benefited by cheaper wheat are the comparatively few middle men and millers.

How about barley? During the last 20 years the range in prices of barley in this country has been from 30 cents to $1 per bushel. But the retail price of beer has not varied a penny during all that time. Who, then, will be benefited by this great loss to the farmer by reason of forcing him to compete with the vast fields of Canada in barley production? The only persons who will be benefited by a 50 per cent tariff reduction on barley will be the few manufacturers of barley products and the brewers. And why this deep interest in the brewing industry? Why has the Democratic Party entered into this alliance with the brewers against the farmers? Are not practically all of the brewers of the country now classed among the millionaires and multimillionaires? Is there any reason for increasing the vast and almost boundless estates of Anheuser, Busch, Blatz, Pabst, Heilman, and Hamm at the expense of the raisers of barley? The ultimate consumer has never suffered because of the prices received by the farmer. Why, then, this studied effort on the part of this Democratic majority to put practically everything the farmer produces on a free-trade basis? What I have said of wheat and barley will apply with equal force to every other grain and meat product.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

Again you say you will benefit the ultimate consumer by compelling the farmer to sell his wool and his sheep for less than he has been receiving. Has he been receiving more than he should that you seek to strike down his industry? The producer of sheep and wool comes within the rule which I have already declared that, measured by the time and labor expended in their production, there is nothing on earth produced by labor that is so cheap as farm products. Why, then, do you want to reduce the prices received by the farmer for his wool? By free wool and free mutton for a time you will undoubtedly reduce the price of sheep and wool to the packer and the wool dealer. And it may be that with free mutton you may slightly reduce the cost of mutton to the consumer for a while. You will reduce it until every herd of sheep in the United States, except the few which may range on Government land or over cheap lands of the arid and semiarid regions, is annihilated. And after you have practically destroyed the sheep industry of the country, what then? Will not the price of mutton go up? Of course if it goes up it will not help out the farmer, as he will not then have sheep to sell. But will you not then be at the mercy of the importer of mutton? Not only will you destroy your home industry and deprive the farmer of a much-needed profit but you will send millions of dollars out of the country to buy mutton and wool; money that ought to be kept within the country.

Mr. President, you will not reduce the cost of a suit of clothes a penny because of a reduction in the cost of wool. The cost of a suit of clothes may be reduced under your Democratic administration, but it will not be because of your reduction in the price of wool paid to the farmer, but because of the general stagnation of business brought about by your tariff bill. Business stagnation is a most potent factor in depressing values and cost of all commodities. It makes, however, mighty little difference to the public how cheap a thing is if it has not the money to buy it.

Mr. President, prices will be lower in the future. Prices demanded for any commodity must adjust themselves to the ability of the public to pay. Any material reduction or even a threatened material reduction in the protection afforded American products is bound to cause a degree of stagnation which will always show itself in lower market quotations. With this threatened revision you have already produced this condition, and without waiting for your bill to become operative prices of most commodities have already gone down. The farmers have already lost millions in the values of all their products. The present low prices of cereals is not due wholly to an abundant crop. Eggs and butter have been since last fall on the average much lower than they have been for many years. I can find no evidence of oversupply of these products. Certainly the hens have not suddenly become more prolific and increased their supply to meet the exigencies of a Democratic administration. The flow of the cow's milk will not increase to meet the stress of the added hunger of Democratic times. The subtle power by which the waves all know and feel the approach of sun or moon does not indicate to hen or cow the approach of a Democratic tariff bill. But human remembrance, recalling past experience, has learned to hedge and economize at its approach with the alacrity with which a man who has experienced one cyclone rushes to the cellar at the approach of another.

In theory the wool producer under our present tariff has been receiving a protection of 11 cents per pound on his wool. In practice he has actually received a benefit of from 7 to 9 cents. That 7 to 9 cents above the world's level of prices is sufficient to justify him in raising sheep in this country. It is sufficient to maintain the industry in this country, and even if it were charged to the ultimate consumer, which it is not, it would not be worth taking into consideration. There is in an ordinary suit of clothes costing from $25 to $30 custom-made, and from $30 to $65 tailor-made, about 4 pounds of wool, at 8 cents per pound; that suit of clothes would be impressed with 32 cents for wool protection—such a mere fraction of the retail price that it is not taken into account. Do any of you for a moment believe that after removing the farmer's protection on wool a suit of clothes which now costs $30 can be bought for $29.68? And if it could, is it worth while to destroy a great industry to save 32 cents on a suit of clothes?

DOES PROTECTION PROTECT?

Mr. President, one of the inherent weaknesses of our human mind is that a rule or conclusion founded on fact and reason, as they once existed, will persist long after both the fact and the reason have disappeared. And so unto this day we still hear people talking about the prices of our grain being fixed by the Liverpool price, because they probably were at one time governed in some degree by Liverpool quotations. They have not been influenced by the Liverpool prices for nearly half a century. Liverpool being a great market for wheat drawn from all sections of the world, its quotations may properly be taken as representing the world's general level of prices plus freight, insurance, and middlemen's profits. When we stop to think we know that the price of any commodity is governed by the demand in the field of greatest consumption. And if six-sevenths of all the wheat raised in the United States is consumed in the United States, it necessarily follows that its price is governed by the home demand rather than the foreign demand. It is true, of course, that world's supply and world's demand affecting what may be called the world's level of prices necessarily affects the American local price, but it never governs it. It can be properly said that the Liverpool price does govern the Canadian price of wheat, because the great bulk of that wheat must find its market there. That is the place of greatest consumption, so far as Canada is concerned. With free trade with Canada the great Canadian surplus of the northwestern Provinces would flow into this country until our prices were level with the Canadian prices or the world's general level. To show how little the price of grain at Liverpool affects the same kind of grain in the United States I will here insert a table showing the range of prices in Minneapolis and Liverpool by months for the years 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912:

The transportation between Minneapolis and Liverpool, including insurance, handling, commissions, profits to exporters, and so forth, is from 21 to 23 cents per bushel. Therefore, if Liverpool governed the prices in Minneapolis, it should always be at least that much higher than the Minneapolis prices. A glance at the table will show an average of 16 cents difference in 1908, a difference of 12 cents in 1909, 6 cents in 1910, 18 cents in 1911, and 19 cents in 1912.

Comparing Winnipeg with Liverpool, we will find that the average price in Winnipeg during 1909 was 1.09, in Liverpool, 1.27; in Winnipeg in 1910, 0.99, in Liverpool, 1.16; in Winnipeg in 1911, 0.95, in Liverpool, 1.09; in Winnipeg in 1912, 0.92, in Liverpool, 1.19. It must be remembered right here that the Winnipeg price is the price quoted for Fort William and Port Arthur, which have the same rate of transportation as Duluth and a little cheaper than Minneapolis. It will thus be observed that the difference between Winnipeg and Liverpool approximately measures the freight, profit for handling, insurance, commissions, and so forth.

Comparing the prices between Winnipeg and Minneapolis for the years 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912 we will find as follows: The average price in Winnipeg in 1909 was 1.09, in Minneapolis, 1.15; in 1910 in Winnipeg, 0.99, in Minneapolis, 1.10; in 1911 in Winnipeg, 0.95, in Minneapolis, 1.01; in 1912 in Winnipeg, 0.92, in Minneapolis, 1.00.

To arrive at the actual benefit the farmers of Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, and all that northwestern section are receiving, I have another table which will show the comparative prices of wheat and barley in the United States at contiguous points along the line. It must be remembered that under the bonding privileges any of this grain on the Canadian side can be shipped through the United States to the point of export for the same freight rates as are charged on the American side. Therefore, if the tariff protection should be taken away, our prices could not be any higher than those on the Canadian side, and at the prices on the Canadian side, on account of the enormous surplus due to the opening up of northwestern Canada—a surplus large enough to glut the American market—we would immediately go down to the world's level of prices. The following is the table:

This table I prepared for the debate on the reciprocity pact in January, 1911, which accounts for the fact that the last date given is January 10, 1911. On April 2, 1912, I again wrote to ascertain the prices of grain at these contiguous points, and in reply I received the quotation of prices on the 6th of April on wheat, barley, and flax. Here are the prices paid for wheat at these points on that day:

The spread between the Canadian and American markets at these contiguous points measures the tariff benefit to the United States. Do any of you suppose for a moment that if the wheat buyer could purchase grain at Snowflake for 78 cents per bushel he would be paying 93 cents per bushel at Hanna, just 4 miles distant on the same road, with exactly the same freight rates?

These tables which I have given showing the marked advantages of the American over the Canadian market can not be explained away on any possible hypothesis other than that of protection accorded under our present tariff law. For more than a dozen years we have not been exporting any of the standard northwestern grain at all. We have been exporting some macaroni and possibly some low-grade grain.

EFFECT OF RECIPROCITY AGITATION.

Two years ago we had before us the reciprocity pact with Canada. It was before the Senate about eight months before it was passed. We who live in the Northwest could not but note how prices of grain of all kinds sagged or advanced according as the news was favorable or unfavorable to the adoption of that treaty. We read in the papers the daily reports giving the rise or decline in our products. The report of February 11, 1911, from the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, published in the Minneapolis Journal, says:

The bottom broke out of the wheat market late this week, and prices suffered the worst decline in several months. Early prices registered moderate declines, and this was followed by a moderate reaction. Both May and July closed Saturday below the dollar mark. This severe break was caused principally by the developments favorable to the adoption of reciprocity with Canada.

Mark the words, "This severe break was caused principally by the developments favorable to the adoption of reciprocity with Canada." The grain buyers knew what that reciprocity pact meant. They knew that the annual output of wheat in that northwestern section of Canada contiguous to Minneapolis was normally about 195,000,000 bushels; that there is enough land which could be put into wheat, all ready for the plow, in that section of the country to raise 3,000,000,000 bushels, nearly enough to supply the entire world market. Of course, it is not put into wheat now because the prices will not justify it. But if prices would justify turning over that new, fertile prairie, seeding it to wheat, that section of Canada west of the Red River of the North could to-day supply enough wheat to feed the world.

There was nothing in sight to materially depress our prices, and the moment the reports went out from Washington that the reciprocity treaty was liable to be adopted the bottom dropped out of our prices.

Again, the same report says:

On Friday and Saturday prices suffered the sharpest break in several weeks. May sold down to 98⅜ cents, the lowest prices for this contract since August, 1909. The near month fluctuated in a range of 4½ cents for the week, and the same contract in Chicago showed a difference of 5⅜ cents. It was thought that reciprocity with Canada would have a more depressing effect on the price of Minneapolis wheat than Chicago because of the geographic situation. The price fluctuations of this week seemed to confirm this theory.

Why did the depressing effect of favorable action upon reciprocity concern Minneapolis more than Chicago? It was because the Canadian wheat is within the Minneapolis territory. Minneapolis is its natural market. It would glut the Minneapolis market before any of it would go into the Chicago market.

Again, the same publication says:

European countries are being offered wheat at prices that would not be profitable for Americans to export. The decline of this week has put the United States nearer an export basis, but still further declines will be necessary to allow this country to enter the European market with any profit.

Why should the Democratic Party wish to force the farmers of the Northwest upon an export basis? Why strike their prices down to the level of the Canadian prices? Why do we thus seek to benefit Canada at the expense of our people? The Canadians do not support our schools; they do not build our roads; they do not pay the heavy taxes in the United States for the special benefits we receive.

EFFECT OF RECIPROCITY AGITATION ON BARLEY.

How did the prospect of Canadian reciprocity affect our barley prices?

Berger Crittenden Co., commission men, speaking of barley in the early part of their report in February, 1911, say:

The market was dull as ever, with only a few cars of Wisconsin sold. Outside of this a few cars of Minnesota were sold, whereas all the other cars carried over for the last three or four days were again carried over to-day, malsters and brewers still holding back. We naturally have to await developments.

On February 9, 1911, barley was sold at 49 cents in Winnipeg; cheap grades in Minneapolis and Duluth, 84 cents; Chicago and Milwaukee, 86 cents. With that difference between Winnipeg, Minneapolis, Duluth, and Milwaukee is it any wonder that the malsters and brewers were awaiting the fate of the reciprocity agreement?

We then came nearly to the close of the session of Congress. It was apparent that the Canadian reciprocity agreement could not at least be passed during that Congress. What was the effect? Here is another article printed in the Minneapolis Journal in its report on the grain exchange the day after Congress adjourned:

Wheat prices soared up to the heights to-day that the market has not seen in over two weeks. The advantage in the near month of 2¾ and 2⅝ cents was the biggest upward daily jump wheat has taken in months. The adjournment of the United States Senate without acting on the McCall bill was the cause of the sharp advance. The market declined 15½ cents, largely on the prospects that the reciprocity treaty might be adopted.

Do you comprehend what that 15 cents per bushel means to the farmer?

The three States, Minnesota and the two Dakotas, raise, say, about 200,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. Fifteen cents a bushel means $30,000,000 upon that wheat crop alone. Let me ask the Democratic Party, Is it not worth while to save this $30,000,000 to the American farmers? Is not he worth that to the country? Is it not far better that he should get a decent living out of his farm, even though you pay 50 cents a year more for your flour? But before the end of the year wheat prices, which had soared up in anticipation that the reciprocity pact might be killed, had to go down again. We passed the law, and grain prices waited on the lowest rung of the ladder for Canada's action. Canada voted on it and turned down our offer. We offered to give her something for something. She declined it, and the next day after her decision the price of wheat went up 6 cents a bushel, and continued to go up thereafter. She refused to accept our offer to take all of her wheat free of tax for a little benefit to our manufactures. Naturally we would think that a party imbued with a national pride would scarcely have renewed this offer within a year; but the Democratic Party, representing the United States to-day, in a most servile spirit says to Canada: Inasmuch as you turned down our offer of something for something, we will make you a present of everything for nothing, we will injure our own farmers to the greatest possible extent, and we will not ask anything in return. Just send your wheat over here, glut our markets, destroy the prosperity of our farmers, not that the Democratic Party loves you more, but that it loves our farmers less. This sudden conversion of the Democratic Party to Christian philosophy is certainly marvelous. But in its zeal, not through love but seeming hate, it has gone far beyond the scriptural doctrine. It has not only turned the country's other cheek to be smitten by Canada but has tied its hands and turned its whole face for a knockout blow.

THE AMERICAN BREWER AND THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

Mr. President, those who will read over the fiscal history of our country for 40 years will not be surprised at the coalition of the Democratic Party and the American brewing association against the American farmer. Their last tariff act reduced the duty on barley from 30 cents a bushel to an ad valorem duty amounting to from 10 to 12 cents per bushel. When the Republican Party came into power in 1897 it destroyed the coalition, gave the farmer again his proper protection and an honest price for his barley. I here present a table showing the rate of duty, quantity imported, value, duty collected, and so forth, for the years 1894 to 1912:

At the end of the fiscal year 1894, while the tariff was 30 cents a bushel on barley, it was worth 45 cents a bushel even under the close times and generally dull markets and prices of all products. In 1894 we changed the tariff to 30 per cent ad valorem, which amounted to from 10 to 12 cents a bushel, and we soon brought the price of barley down from 45 to 30 cents a bushel, or a loss of 15 cents a bushel—33⅓ per cent. Then we raised the tariff again in 1897 to 30 cents a bushel, and barley again steadily advanced in price and continued to do so until 1908, when it was 73 cents a bushel. The large crop of 1909 brought it down to 55 cents a bushel, and the short crop of 1910 sent it up again to 86 and 96 cents, and in some instances even a dollar a bushel. For the fiscal year when the duty was 30 per cent ad valorem, amounting to 10 or 12 cents a bushel, we imported 2,000,000 bushels. Afterwards, when we made the tariff 30 cents a bushel, the importations dropped down to 104,000 bushels.

The best way to know whether our prices are the higher and the extent of the benefit which we derive from protection to farm products is to compare the prices at adjacent points on the Canadian and American line, and here again I will insert a table of prices paid for barley at such points on April 6, 1912:

Portal is a little town on the border, with a street for the border line. On one side floats the British flag and on the other floats the American flag. One is called Portal and the other is called North Portal, but they are practically the same town.

It will be observed from the above table that on the 6th day of April, 1912, our prices ranged all along the line just about 30 cents a bushel higher than the Canadian prices—just the amount of the tariff. Do not you know that under free trade our prices will drop to the Canadian level? Do not you know that if the brewer can get Canadian barley at Gretna for 60 cents he is not going to pay 90 cents a bushel for that barley at Neche, just 2 miles away and on the same road?

No; Mr. President, no Senator need attempt to salve his conscience by voting away every shred of the farmer's protection by trying to convince himself that the farmer gets no real protection. He might as well try to hypnotize himself into the belief that 2 and 2 make 3. The actual prices received show with mathematical accuracy just to what extent he is benefited by protection.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND FLAX GROWER.

The farmers of my State raise about half the flaxseed raised in the United States. The other half is raised principally in Minnesota and South Dakota. We are often compelled to raise flax or nothing on our land. An early fall of snow or early freezing may prevent fall plowing, a late or wet spring delay the spring plowing, until no other crop can be planted and matured, and so we put the land into oats and flax. It is a difficult and uncertain crop to raise. We need a very good price to get any profit out of it. With a protection of 25 cents per bushel we have generally received the full benefit of that protection.

Here again is a table showing prices received April 6, 1912, at adjacent points along the Canadian border by the American and the Canadian farmer:

UNITED STATES.
Pembina	$1.98
Neche	1.98
Walhalla	1.97

You will see that our farmers have had an advantage over the Canadian farmer of just about the amount of the tariff, 25 cents per bushel. Why do you want to deprive him of that? Heaven knows he is not getting wealthy raising flax.

TARIFF A LOCAL QUESTION.

Mr. President, I have stated that you seem to wish to punish the northern farmer because he is not affiliated with your own party. I am borne out in this by the fact that while you put American wheat produced by the northern farmer on the free list, where he has the worst kind of competition in the world, you protect the rice farmer of the South 33⅓ per cent on his product. Why the discrimination against the northern farmer?

The farmer may be slow, but he is quite sure. He may forget, but the hard raps of poverty can jog his memory. Once pass this accursed measure and before 1914 he will be fully awake to the realization of the offense committed against him. He will begin to compare the prices he has received during the last 8 or 10 years with the prices under your free trade with Canada and the world. He will change the complexion of the House of Representatives, if this bill passes, mighty suddenly; and if he can not change the Senate within that time it will not be because of a disinclination, but because of a political impossibility. Pass this bill as it is and unless this cut-throat policy which annihilated the Republican Party in 1912 continues there will not be a Democratic State in the whole North. It took the farmer 16 years to forget the last Democratic policy. Pass this bill and the generation living will never forget you.

AMERICAN SUPPLY NOT WORLD'S SUPPLY GOVERNS VALUES.

The great bulk of the wheat crop of the world is raised in the northern hemisphere. Its quantity is well known by October 1 of the year in which it is raised. The northern wheat estimate can not affect prices very materially before the middle of the ensuing winter. Therefore the prevailing price of wheat for the months of October, November, and December may be said to be founded almost wholly upon the supply furnished by the crop of that year.

A glance at the grain statistics for a number of years will demonstrate how much greater is the influence of home supply over world supply in fixing our prices. For illustration, in 1908 the world produced 3,181,548,000 bushels. The average price in Minneapolis for the months of October, November, and December of that year was $1.06. In 1909 the world produced 3,584,739,000 bushels; average price for said months, $1.05.

Thus it will be seen that an increase of 400,000,000 bushels in the world's supply scarcely affected our home price. But how about our own supply? The States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota produced, in 1911, 131,935,000 bushels of wheat. The Minneapolis price for the months of October, November, and December averaged $1.04. The same States in 1912 produced 263,043,000 bushels of wheat; average price paid in Minneapolis for said months, 85 cents. There is the real influence on grain prices. Four hundred million bushels difference in the world supply scarcely affected our prices, a difference of over a hundred million bushels in these States and about a hundred million bushels excess in the supply of the entire United States brought the prices down from $1.04 to 85 cents per bushel.

For the first time in about 15 years we are nearly on an export basis in these three States. Our wheat has dropped 20 cents per bushel, and the Democratic Party says it must stay on an export basis—it must stay down. The time when the farmer needs the better prices for his crop is when it is short. With protection he will have this automatic adjustment and receive his better prices when he needs them most. With your free-trade policy, if the world has a good crop and these States a poor crop, the farmer is bound to lose heavily. So by this bill you compel him to be on the losing side whichever way the crop conditions may turn.

DANGER OF IMPORTATION.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. President, whether the Democratic Senators who vote away the interest of many millions of our best citizens fully realize the danger to which they are about to expose them. Do you realize that the grain supply of the world is increasing by leaps and bounds, and more rapidly than any other product? That you may not be as blind to the facts as you are deaf to the demand for fairness, I have prepared a table showing the increase in the production of wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed by the principal producing countries from 1900 to 1912. The table is as follows:

Production of wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed by the principal producing countries, from 1900 to 1912.

I only call attention to the increases by percentage:

In the United States the wheat crop increased in these 12 years	39
In Canada	271
In the Provinces of Canada west of the Great Lakes	726
In Australia	83
In Argentina	63
In the Russian Empire	59

With that enormous increase in production, are you still frightened lest there will not be food enough produced in the world for city people?

Turn to the oats production and we will find that the increase—

	Per cent.
In the United States in those years was	75
In Canada	134
In the Provinces of Canada west of the Great Lakes	261
In Australia	8
In Argentina	2,952
In the Russian Empire	25

With this enormous increase in the oats production of the world, are you still fearful of the sufficiency of supply for man and beast?

Turning to barley, we will find that the increase in the United States—

	Per cent.
In those years was	280
In Canada	80
In the Provinces of Canada west of the Great Lakes	313
In the Russian Empire	96

Does this look as though there were danger of a barley famine and any long and continued suffering on the part of your allies, the American Brewing Association?

Turning to flax, I find in the United States there has been practically no increase. This is due to some extent to the heavy loss in the flax crop of 1912 by reason of early frost and snow. To make this up, however, you will find that the Provinces of Canada west of the Great Lake region increased 2,354 per cent; Argentina, 164 per cent.

Does this look as though the Steel Trust and other manufacturers of steel products were in any immediate danger of an under supply of flaxseed oil for their paints and varnishes?

But if the phantom of starvation still haunts you, let me attempt to banish it by turning on a flood of light on the possibilities of food supply right at your door, as you propose to turn on that flood of grain from Canada to bewilder and overwhelm the farmers of my State. I know that those who have not made a study of the fact comprehend very little about the country that is immediately north of the United States and lying west of the Red River of the North. There are five or six great Provinces, and any one of them would make five or six of the average States of this Union. Every one of them is fertile, every one is capable of producing a greater per acre crop than can be produced for the most part in the United States:

	Acres.
Saskatchewan has	160,416,000
Manitoba has	47,188,480
Alberta has	162,000,000
Total	369,604,480

A careful and most conservative estimate has been made of the tillable acreage in said Provinces by the Dominion of Canada. The following is the estimate:

	Acres.
Saskatchewan tillable acreage	86,826,240
Manitoba	27,000,000
Alberta	100,000,000
Total	213,826,240

These figures perhaps do not give to the average person a very definite idea as to the size of these Provinces. To make this more clear, Saskatchewan is as large as the States of Idaho, Iowa, Illinois, and Michigan combined, and that Province is capable of producing much more than all those States combined. Manitoba is larger than North Dakota and South Dakota combined. All of this vast territory is being brought into closer communication with the world by the great transcontinental lines of railway with their great number of feeding lines.

As I have shown, the average crop of the world is about three and one-half billion bushels of wheat. Those Provinces of Canada alone can easily duplicate the present world's supply. It would produce it to-day if there were the demand. The possibilities of that country stand as an enormous club to drive down the value of every cereal produced in the Northwest.

Unlike the United States, which consumes nearly all of its wheat crop, Canada does not consume one-seventh of its western crop. That vast surplus must go into the world's market. Its nearest market is the Minneapolis, Duluth, Buffalo, and other mills of the Northwest. Open the floodgates of our present tariff wall and it will immediately pour over and into this country and level our prices to the world prices and keep them level for at least a century.

If the farmer were more prosperous than the rest of the world, I could see some reason for legislating against his interests, but as he is far less prosperous than any other people in the United States, further depressing his prices, further aggravating the injustices of his situation, seems to me to be almost criminal.

PRESENT IMPORTATIONS UNDER PROTECTION.

Mr. President, I am here to declare that if the tariff should be so high as to absolutely prohibit importations of every farm product, it would not improperly or unduly increase the value of those products. Why? Because we are still an exporting Nation. We are still capable of oversupplying our own markets. We have the land to produce all that the American people can consume for years to come, and with proper and justly profitable prices we will meet every demand for home consumption. Such exclusion of foreign products would simply put the farmer on a fair trading basis with the consumer.

Even with our present protection, importations are coming in to such an extent as to keep our prices down as low as, or lower than, they ought in conscience to be kept down. Then why increase the importations to drive them still lower?

I ask here to insert a table showing importations of farm and dairy products during the past five years:

You propose not only to reduce the farm prices below a proper living basis, but also to surrender and make up by some other method of taxation the millions upon millions of dollars of revenue.

In addition to the importations which I have mentioned, we are to-day importing meats from Australia and other countries, and with free meat you can find an opportunity to injure and oppress the American farmer.

Mr. President, we are to-day back upon an export basis. Wheat to-day is higher in Winnipeg than it is in the United States. Why? For two reasons: Money stringency, depression, and lack of confidence, combined with an oversupply upon our own part, have made our wheat to-day lower than wheat in Winnipeg. You can not account for this on any ground of world supply and demand, because the Winnipeg price must be upon the basis of export, and in 1913 it is higher than that in the United States.

DESTRUCTION OF MARKET FOR FLAX STRAW.

Mr. President, I can not accuse the Democratic Party of working blindly on this tariff bill. That party has not only been lynx-eyed in finding ways in which it could injure the northwestern farmer, but seems also to be possessed with the lynx instinct to destroy wherever it can smell blood.

I had hoped that the party might possibly overlook a little avenue—very little one indeed—where the farmer, in case his crops were destroyed by drought or his flax failed to fill, might secure a few dollars by the sale of the straw, possibly enough to pay the tax on the land. We have a number of very little tow mills, as they are called, in our State, which pay the farmer from $2 to $3 per ton for his flax straw, just enough to pay him to load it and haul it to town, if he lives within a few miles, as it requires two men and a team to load and otherwise handle the straw. You can see how small is his profit. If he had to hire both men, he could not get enough out of the flax straw to pay for hauling it. I hoped this little mite, which we call "hard-times revenue," was so small that the great Democratic Party would miss it; but like that evening animal which can not see the room or ceiling around which it flies, yet can see clearly the eye of a needle, so the Democratic Party, floundering all around this tariff subject, caught sight of this little $2 or $3 hard-time money which the farmer could get out of his flax straw. And this little hard-times income must be destroyed.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, who gave a hearing to those who manufacture tow from this straw, reduced the duty on tow from $20 to $10 per ton. But the Democratic majority of the Senate reasoned well as to what the effect of this $10 duty on tow might be. They said, "If we allow this $10, some of these tow mills might survive, and if they do survive, they might still buy some of this flax straw from the farmers, and we can not allow these bloated mortgagors to find new ways of paying the interest on their mortgages."

Just why this party left 15 cents a bushel on flax and barley and 6 cents a bushel on oats I can not say. I can only account for it on the ground, either that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] convinced them that the farmers would not receive any benefit from this meager tariff on these two crops, and therefore they might as well use this cheap bait to catch a few stray votes next year, or that they wanted to show to the farmers of the country that the Democratic Party had not been wholly swallowed by the brewers and flax importers.

I dare say there is not one man among those who cut down the flaxseed duty who has the slightest idea of what it costs to thrash a bushel of flaxseed, much less what it costs to raise it.

You know that under ordinary conditions we never get full benefit of the duty on cereals. I have shown you that with a 25-cent duty on wheat our average benefit or protection has been between 10 and 12 cents per bushel.

Mr. President, representing a State which is wholly agricultural in its interests, owning considerable lands in the State myself, operating, or attempting to operate, and cultivate and raise crops on those lands, familiar with the cost of land, farm machinery, stock, labor, and so forth, familiar with the chances one takes against loss of crop, partial or in whole, I can speak with a degree of accuracy upon what ought to be the price realized from the products of the soil, what the farmer should receive for his wheat, flax, barley, oats, and potatoes, in order to be able to run his farm, where he must hire some of the work done. He should receive for his wheat at least, per bushel, $1.40; for his flax, $2; for his barley, 75 cents; for his oats, 65 cents, and for his potatoes, 60 cents.

Give him the American market that of right belongs to him and in a very short time, when consumption and production about equal each other, he will receive this much for his grain. He is to-day receiving for his wheat about 80 cents; for his flax, $1.22; for his oats, 32 cents; for his barley, 38 cents; for his potatoes, 50 cents.

I had a telegram from the State a few days ago, saying that the crop in the State will not in any event be more than one-half of what it was last year. In other words, more than half a crop can not be expected.

Reports from Canada show a large northwestern crop. With only half a crop to our credit, the farmers of this country ought to have a better price per bushel for that crop. But fearing that they might have a little benefit for the natural law of compensation, you are about to unload on their market and overwhelm it with the vast surplus of the Canadian northwest.

I ought to say a word right here with reference to the countervailing duties. I notice that you finally provide by your caucus that wheat shall be free to every country that will allow our own free. I think you make reference to that with one other product—semolina.

Our importations of cereal products will come mostly from Canada. Flax and some wheat may, under free trade, come from Venezuela. Although Canada may have a duty to-day of 12 cents per bushel upon wheat, she certainly will not hold as against her own citizens that duty when she knows that they can get 8 or 12 cents a bushel better for a while in our own States. As we all know, whenever the Government introduces a bill pertaining to the fiscal policy of Canada, that bill becomes a law the day after its introduction, and it remains the law until it has been changed by Parliament. So we will get no benefit with this countervailing duty. It will go out of existence just as soon as it will be beneficial to the other country to have it out of existence.

PROTECTION NECESSARY TO KEEP OPEN TOW MILLS.

What do you expect to accomplish by destroying the tow industry in the United States? The tow made from the farmer's flax straw is not used for clothing. Fine linen fabrics are not made from it. It is used for upholstering furniture, car seats, and so forth, for packing or lining for refrigerator cars, and for wrapping and writing paper. The farmer can raise flax straw that will produce as fine linen as anywhere in the world, but under present conditions in the labor market he can not afford to care for and market a flax of sufficient fiber length to make linen fabrics. But he can raise flax for the seed, and after thrashing it he can sell this straw, broken by the separator, and therefore of short fiber, for these other purposes. And so long as the tow mills can compete in tow products with Canada or Russia he will have a market. When those mills are closed he will not have a market.

From the best information I can secure I am convinced that free tow of flax will close every tow mill in the country and thereby render worthless every ton of flax straw raised in the United States, amounting, I believe, to about 8,000,000 tons.

The House committee took off all the duty on flax straw. This would be an injury to the American farmer in some sections, but as the price of flax straw is very little, it can not be hauled or freighted to advantage from any great distance. So the farmers would still hold their markets in their near vicinity. They would still have a market for flax straw if the mills were kept running. But the House, while it reduced the duty on tow of flax from $20 to $10 per ton, still left some protection, possibly enough to allow the mills to survive. Now, why did the Democratic members of the Committee on Finance remove all duty? At whose instance was it done? Did the rope manufacturers appear before your subcommittees and ask for free raw material? Did you call the farmer before your committees? Why should he not appear? He is worth more to the country than all the rope twisters in the world. Why should his interests be wantonly thrown away at the behest of the manufacturers?

This is not a question of cheap clothing. The hackling, retting, and scutching of flax straw for the linen fabrics is so tedious and laborious that a ton of the tow thus produced is worth as high as 18 cents per pound, or $360 per ton, while the tow that is produced from the straw furnished by the farmers for car linings and similar purposes is worth, according to the quality at the mills, from $18 to $60 per ton, and to this must be added the freight of from $3 to $9.60 a ton for transportation to the East where it is used or manufactured.

Mr. President, I know how futile is every effort to make any change in the cereal paragraphs. I may hope, however, that the Democratic majority in the Senate, after they have thoroughly had laid before them the tow proposition, after they thoroughly understand that this little hard-earned money of the farmer will not affect the linen cloths of any character, after they have learned to what extent the farmer will be injured in general, will agree with us to place that little product back upon the protected list to the extent of $10 per ton.

I will go more fully and freely into the question of the tow manufacture at some future time, as I shall into the question of the meat products, on behalf of the farmers of the United States.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably House concurrent resolution No. 11. I ask for its immediate consideration, and I desire in this connection to make a short statement.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 30,000 copies of the bill H. R. 3321, with amendments, as reported in the Senate July 11, 1913, 20,000 copies for the use of the House and 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the estimated cost of printing the 30,000 copies in bill form with the index is $4,475; in bill form without the index, $3,586; and in document form, $1,192.40. I do not desire to make an amendment to the resolution, because it would have to go back to the House, and everyone interested in receiving a copy of the bill wants it at once.

I have heard from Mr. MANN, of Illinois, the author of the House concurrent resolution, and he is agreeable to have the bill printed in document form, as these copies are only to be sent out through the country for information.

Without offering an amendment, I will simply state that it will be understood that the 30,000 copies will be printed in document form at a saving of nearly $2,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if in document form it will have an index?

Mr. SMOOT. It will have an index.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be almost worthless without an index. The index will add greatly to its value.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SWANSON. In the absence of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], at his request, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 2 o'clock on Thursday next.

Mr. SIMMONS. In view of the fact that I gave notice with reference to a proposed meeting of the Senate on Wednesday, I desire to say that after conference with my colleagues on this and the other side of the Chamber, an adjournment until Thursday will be satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it shall adjourn to meet at 2 o'clock on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON subsequently said: I have just been informed by the junior Senator from Indiana that he desires to have a meeting of the Senate to-morrow to offer possibly some amendments to the Erdman Act, which is a very important matter. So I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed that when it adjourns to-day it will adjourn until 2 o'clock on Thursday.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until 2 o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution (S. Res. 113) for reference to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XIX of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:

"SEC. 6. That the Senate may at any time, upon motion of a Senator, fix a day and hour for a final vote upon any matter pending in the Senate: Provided, however, That this rule shall not be invoked to prevent debate by any Senator who requests opportunity to express his views upon such pending matter within a time to be fixed by the Senate.

"The notice to be given by the Senate under this section, except by consent, shall not be less than a week, unless such requests be made within the last two weeks of the session."

For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XXII, XXVI, and XL, are modified:

"Any Senator may demand of a Senator making a motion if it be made for dilatory or obstructive purposes, and if the Senator making the motion declines or evades an answer or concedes the motion to have been made for such purposes, the President of the Senate shall declare such motion out of order."

Mr. President, the minority veto in the Senate, with its power to prevent the majority from fulfilling its pledges to the American people, should end. The right to obstruct the public business by a factional filibuster must cease. The power of an individual Senator to coerce or blackmail the Senate must be terminated. These national evils can no longer be concealed by the false cloak of "freedom of debate."

Those who defend the antiquated rule of unlimited parliamentary debate do so chiefly on the ground of precedent. The precedents of the intellectual world, of the parliamentary world, are entirely against the preposterous rule which has been permitted to survive in the United States Senate alone. What are the precedents of other parliamentary bodies.

PRECEDENTS.

The precedents in the State of Maine and in every New England State, in every Atlantic State, in every Gulf State, in every Pacific State, in every Rocky Mountain State, in every Mississippi Valley State, and in every State bordering on Canada are against unlimited debate or the minority veto. In both the senate and house of every State the precedent is to the contrary.

The precedent is against it in New Hampshire.

The precedent is against it in Vermont.

The precedent is against it in Massachusetts.

The precedent is against it in Rhode Island and Connecticut.

What Senator from the New England States will venture to say that the precedents of every single one of the New England States are unsound, unwise, and ought to be modified to conform to the superior wisdom of the Senate rule?

The precedent is against it in New York, and in Pennsylvania, and in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia. What Senator upon this floor representing these Commonwealths will venture to say that the people of his State have adopted a false standard of parliamentary practice which they ought to abandon for the superior virtue of the minority veto established in the Senafe by an archaic rule of 1806?

The precedent in North Carolina, in South Carolina, in Georgia, in Alabama, in Florida, in Mississippi, and Tennessee is against it. Will the Senators from these States say that the parliamentary rule and practice of their own States, which they have the honor to represent upon this floor, are unwise and not safe and should be modified to comply with the superior rule of the minority veto?

The precedents of Louisiana, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, of Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Montana, of the Dakotas, of Nebraska and Kansas, are all against this unwise practice of the United States Senate.

The precedents of Colorado, Wyoming, and Minnesota, of Idaho, of Nevada, of Arizona and New Mexico, and of the great Pacific States—Washington, Oregon, and California—provide for the closing of debate and are against the evil practice which still remains in vogue in the United States Senate.

Why, Mr. President, the precedent of every city, big and little, in the United States is against the right of minority veto under the false pretense of "freedom of debate."

Every one of the 48 States of the Union, while permitting freedom of debate, has set us the wise and virtuous precedent of permitting the control by the majority. I remind every Senator in this body that in his own State his legislative assembly, whether in the house or in the senate, does not permit a minority veto under the pretense of freedom of debate. It is the rule of common sense and of common honesty.

In the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States the right to move the previous question and limit debate has been wisely and profitably practiced since its foundation.

ENGLISH PRECEDENTS.

The rule of the majority is the rule in all the parliaments of English-speaking people. In the Parliament of Great Britain, in the House of Lords, the "contents" pass to the right and the "not contents" pass to the left, and the majority rules.

In the House of Commons the "ayes" pass to the right and the "noes" pass to the left, and the majority rules. (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. 20, p. 856.)

The great English statesman, Mr. Gladstone, having found that the efficiency of Parliament was destroyed by the right of unlimited debate, was led to propose cloture in the first week of the session of 1882, moving this resolution on the 20th of February, and expressing the opinion that the House should settle its own procedure. The acts of Mr. Gladstone and others of like opinion finally led to the termination of unlimited debate in the procedure of Parliament. In these debates every fallacious argument now advanced by those who wish to retain unlimited debate in the United States Senate has been abundantly answered, leaving no ground of sound reasoning to reconsider these stale and exploded arguments.

The cloture of debate is very commonly used in the Houses of Parliament in Great Britain, for example, in standing order No. 26. The return to order of the House of Commons, dated December 12, 1906, shows that the cloture was moved 112 times. (See vol. 94, Great Britain House of Commons, sessional papers, 1906.)

FRANCE.

In France the cloture is moved by one or more members crying out "La cloture!"

The president immediately puts the question, and if a member of the minority wishes to speak he is allowed to assign his reasons against the close of the debate, but no one can speak in support of the motion and only one member against it. The question is then put by the president, "Shall the debate be closed?" and if it is resolved in the affirmative the debate is closed and the main question is put to the vote.

M. Guizot, speaking on the efficacy of the cloture before a committee of the House of Commons in 1848, said:

I think that in our chamber it was an indispensable power, and I think it has not been used unjustly or improperly generally. Calling to mind what has passed of late years, I do not recollect any serious and honest complaint of the cloture. In the French Chambers, as they have been during the last 34 years, no member can imagine that the debate would have been properly conducted without the power of pronouncing the cloture.

He also stated in another part of his evidence that—

Before the introduction of the cloture in 1814 the debates were protracted indefinitely, and not only were they protracted, but at the end, when the majority wished to put an end to the debate and the minority would not, the debate became very violent for protracting the debate, and out of the house among the public it was a source of ridicule.

The French also allow the previous question, and it can always be moved; it can not be proposed on motions for which urgency is claimed, except after the report of the committee of initiative. (Dickinson's Rules and Procedure of Foreign Parliaments, p. 426.)

GERMANY.

The majority rule controls likewise in the German Empire and they have the cloture upon the support of 30 members of the house, which is immediately voted on at any time by a show of hands or by the ayes and noes.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In Austria-Hungary, motions for the closing of the debate are to be put to the vote at once by the president without any question, and thereupon the matter is determined. If the majority decides for a close of the debate, the members whose names are put down to speak for or against the motions may choose from amongst them one speaker on each side, and the matter is disposed of by voting a simple yes or no. (Ibid., p. 404.)

AUSTRIA.

Austria also, in its independent houses of Parliament, has the cloture, which may be put to the vote at any time in both houses, and a small majority suffices to carry it. This is done, however, without interrupting any speech in actual course of delivery; and when the vote to close the debate is passed each side has one member represented in a final speech on the question. (Ibid, p. 409.)

BELGIUM.

In Belgium they have the cloture, and if the prime minister and president of the chamber are satisfied that there is need of closing the debate a hint is given to some member to raise the cry of "La cloture," after a member of the opposition has concluded his speech, and upon the demand of 10 members, granting permission, however, to speak for or against the motion under restrictions. The method here does not prevent any reasonable debate, but permits a termination of the debate by the will of the majority. The same rule is followed in the Senate of Belgium. (Ibid., p. 420.)

DENMARK.

In Denmark also they have the cloture, which can be proposed by the president of the Danish chambers, which is decided by the chamber without debate. Fifteen members of the Landsthing may demand the cloture. (Ibid., p. 422.)

NETHERLANDS.

In both houses of the Parliament of the Netherlands they have the cloture. Five members of the First Chamber may propose it and five members may propose it in the Second Chamber. They have the majority rule. (Ibid., p. 461.)

PORTUGAL.

In Portugal they have the cloture in both chambers, and debate may be closed by a special motion, without discretion. In the upper house they permit two to speak in favor of and two against it. The cloture may be voted. (Ibid., p. 469.)

SPAIN.

The cloture in Spain may be said to exist indirectly, and to result from the action allowed the president on the order of parliamentary discussion. (Ibid., p. 477.)

SWITZERLAND.

The cloture exists in Switzerland both in the Conseil des Etats and Conseil National.

Many of the ablest and best Senators who have ever been members of this body have urged the abatement of this evil, including such men as Senator George G. Vest, of Missouri; Senator Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut; Senator David B. Hill, of New York; Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts; and Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, who introduced resolutions or spoke for the amendment of this evil practice of the Senate. (Appendix, Note A.)

Mr. President, the time has come in the history of the United States when Congress shall be directly responsive to the will of the majority of 90,000,000 of people without delay, evasion, or obstruction. We are in the midst of the most gigantic century in the history of the world, when every reason looking to the welfare and advance of the human race bids us march forward in compliance with the magnificent intelligence and humane impulses of the American people.

We have the most important problems before us—financial, commercial, sociological. Fifteen great propositions of improvement of government were pledged by the recent Democratic platform, and almost a like number were pledged by other party platforms. We have work to do that means the preservation, the conservation, and the development of human life, of human energy, of human health. We have before us the great problems which mean the development of this vast country, and we should have the machinery of government by which to respond with reasonable promptitude to mature public opinion, but the rules of the Senate have been such as to prevent action; the rules of the Senate are such as to prevent action now with regard to the great questions before the country. The rules of the Senate have put the power in the hands of a small faction or of a single individual to obstruct, without reason, and to prevent action by Congress. I favor the right of the majority of the Senate to control the Senate after giving every reasonable freedom of debate to the opposition, so that the people of the country may have both sides of every proposition. But I am strongly opposed to the minority veto, or to a single Senator obstructing and preventing the control of the Senate by the responsible majority.

In a short session of Congress the Senate will appropriate a thousand million dollars in less than 350 working hours. Each working hour means the appropriation of $3,000,000 of the hard-earned taxes taken from the labor of the American people. Every two minutes the Senate averages an appropriation of $100,000 of taxes, and yet, instead of addressing itself to a comprehension of the necessity for such taxes, for such expenditure, a single Senator, or a small faction or a minority, may detain the Senate for hours and for days and for weeks while great questions of public policy wait, leaving the Senate to be thus distracted by filibustering tactics, discussions of immaterial or trivial matters, reading of worthless papers and statistics, last year's almanac—in a deliberate obstruction of the majority by the minority.

EXTREME DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING LEGISLATION THAT IS CONFESSEDLY OF VALUE, EVEN WITHOUT A FILIBUSTER.

Mr. President, before a bill can be passed that is desired by the American people, no matter how worthy, it must first be carefully drawn, submitted to the House of Representatives, and by the House submitted to a committee, and almost invariably such a bill is sent from the committee of the House to the executive department for a report; and when the report comes in it is considered in the committee, and finally and usually, where the majority desires the bill passed, it will be reported back to the House—abundant opportunity having been thus given to discover its weak points or defects.

When it goes to the House it takes its place upon the calendar and awaits the time with patience when it can be taken up on the calendar.

It must be read three times in the House, it must be printed, it is discussed in the House, and, finally, if after having passed every criticism and scrutiny it be approved by the majority of the House, it is signed by the Speaker and finds its way to the United States Senate. When it reaches the Senate it is again sent to a committee, the committee further considers it, and, finally, if a majority favor, it is reported back to the Senate to take its place upon the calendar. And many a good bill has died on the calendar in the Senate because of a single objection to it—what might be called the private right of veto by an individual Senator. If at last it is permitted, by consent, to come before the Senate and does not excite any prolonged debate, it may become a law by reason of a majority vote of those present. But if anywhere along the line of this slow, deliberate procedure any serious objection is raised by a minority, or by a Senator, either can by dilatory motions, by insisting upon hearings, by making the point of "no quorum," by using a Senator's right to object and demand the regular order, by using his position to ask reconsideration and a rehearing, or, perhaps, an additional report from the executive department, and then demanding hearings in the executive department while the report is delayed, and in a thousand other ingenious ways a single Senator, much less a faction or willful minority, can make it almost impossible to pass a bill of great merit. For three years I have been trying to pass a bill to establish an improved organization of the Bureau of Public Health and have been unable to get any action, for or against, by Congress. I only refer to this as an example of many meritorious measures which have never been acted upon, and for which there is a powerful matured public sentiment urgently insisting upon action.

The Senate of the United States has rules for its conduct that make it almost impossible to get a bill through, except by unanimous consent, where a resolute minority is opposed to the passage of the bill. Under the so-called privilege of "freedom of debate," a group of Senators can hold up any measure indefinitely by endless talk in relays and by the use of dilatory motions, making the point of "no quorum" moving to "adjourn," moving to "take a recess," moving to "adjourn to a day certain," reading for an hour or so from Martin Chuzzlewit or Pickwick Papers, making the point of "no quorum," moving to "adjourn," making the point of "no quorum," moving to "adjourn to a day certain," moving to "take a recess," moving to go into "executive session," and, under the rules, may read a few chapters of Huckleberry Finn—and this puerile conduct is dignified by the false pretense of being "freedom of debate," when, in point of fact, it is nothing of the kind. It is the minority obstruction and the personal veto under the pretense of freedom of debate, under the false pretense of freedom of debate, under the ridiculous pretense of freedom of debate, under the contemptible and odious pretense of freedom of debate. It is not freedom of debate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he does not believe that the defeat of the Indian appropriation bill at the last session of Congress was in the interest of the public?

Mr. OWEN. I think perhaps it was improved by this Congress.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not true that the Indian appropriation bill which passed Congress at this session is a better bill than the one which was before this body during the last session of Congress?

Mr. OWEN. It is practically the same, but it has been somewhat improved.

Mr. GRONNA. And the bill which was before Congress at that time was defeated by one Senator, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], was it not?

Mr. OWEN. There was a delay of the bill by the Senator from New Mexico which resulted in its defeat.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, I will ask if the rules had been changed as he now indicates he would like to have them changed, in his judgment would it have been possible, with a majority for it, to have defeated that bill?

Mr. OWEN. I think not; but a discussion of the conditions in old Mexico which killed the bill was irrelevant and not justified by any public need.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma another question. The Senator complains because a certain measure which he has had before Congress for a long time has not been passed. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state to the Senate that a majority of the Senate have been in favor of that particular measure?

Mr. OWEN. It is impossible for anyone to say positively what a majority favor until they are permitted to vote upon a measure; but I have no doubt a large majority did favor it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can not comprehend that there is any necessity for protecting a majority. It seems to me that a rule to protect a minority is of more importance to the country than a rule to protect a majority.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall not at this moment deflect from my argument to answer the observations of the Senator from North Dakota. I shall do that at a later time, because the matter is going to lead to considerable debate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am sorry I interrupted the Senator, but I could not let go unchallenged the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma when he said it was odious to operate under the rules that we have because certain measures have been held up. I tried to point out to the Senator that the country has benefited under the present rules.

Mr. OWEN. The country has been very greatly harmed under the present rules, as I shall show before this debate concludes. At present I am simply laying a preamble for the consideration of this matter. It is going to take much time. It is going to be debated at considerable length in this body. It is going before the country for the country to determine whether or not men shall be permitted by the people of the United States to stand upon the floor of the Senate and favor the control of the majority by the minority and favor a policy making it impossible for party pledges to be carried out in this Republic.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. It occurred to me that while the Senator from North Dakota had given an instance in which, according to his judgment, a bill was odious and was defeated a number of other very meritorious bills were defeated because of the filibustering tactics which were adopted with reference to the Indian appropriation bill. I have in mind at this moment the sundry civil bill, which involved the expenditure of more than $100,000,000. That bill was defeated in the last minutes of the last session simply because the Senate could not control debate.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; that is true. I will not say there is not the possibility, under some circumstances, of some good ensuing from a vigorous protest by the minority. I am perfectly willing to agree to that. But yielding that point in no way affects the validity of the argument that the majority should be charged with the responsibility of government; and I in no wise modify the comment I have made upon the odious and ridiculous pretense of "freedom of debate" in this body, which has served as a cloak for a minority veto and for improper processes in this body. I say it is not freedom of debate. The minority veto is, in effect, a denial of freedom of debate. A man in charge of an important bill is driven to refrain from debating the bill because he would be playing into the hands of the opponents of the bill, who are trying to kill the bill by exhausting the patience of the Senate by endless volubility and unending dilatory motions.

This thoughtless rule of unlimited freedom of debate was adopted in 1806, when there were 34 Senators, who met together to discuss their common affairs in courtesy and good faith, when only a very few bills were brought before the Senate. They had no conception that unlimited freedom of debate really meant a minority veto. Now that the Senate has 96 Members, representing 90,000,000 people, when its interests are of the most gigantic importance, when its modern problems of stupendous consequence are demanding prompt and virile action, when hundreds of important bills are pending, this hoary-headed reprobate rises up and strikes a posture of inscrutable wisdom and admonishes the world not to touch this sacred principle of unlimited "freedom of debate." The venerable age of this foolish precedent shall not save it from the just charge of imbecility and legislative vice.

The power to obstruct the will of the people by the Senate rules is the last ditch of privilege.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to inject there that, in my judgment, the rule against which the Senator from Oklahoma is contending has been the rule that has protected the rights of this country far more than the rights of the people have ever suffered. Instead of being the last resort of privilege, it is the hope of the minority when it contends against an injustice.

Mr. OWEN. At a future day I will demonstrate the fundamental error that lies in the argument of the Senator from Kansas, but I can not permit him at present to divert me from my present argument or break into the middle of my sentence with a speech.

In the House of Representatives the party in power with its majority is carrying out the will of the majority, permitting reasonable debate and wide publicity to the views of all Members. But in the Senate, while we have reorganized the committees and have made important improvements in the rules, there still remains the point of unlimited debate, of irrelevant debate, of dilatory motions, whereby the minority can still prevent the action of the majority placed in power by the people. The United States Senate is the only place where the people's will can be successfully thwarted, and here it can be obstructed and denied by delays, by dilatory motions, by irrelevant debate, and unlimited discussion.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks of the transaction of business in the House. Is the Senator prepared to say that a larger proportion of the measures introduced in the House are passed there than is the case in the Senate? Further, is he prepared to say that when we finish a session the House has done more business than the Senate, and the calendar of the House is clearer than that of the Senate, or is the calendar of the Senate clearer than that of the House?

Mr. OWEN. Answering that question, I will say that any large body, such as the House, which introduces, relatively to the number of its members, a much larger number of bills, has a much larger number of bills undisposed of. But that does not in any wise abate the force of the argument I am presenting.

Mr. WARREN. One moment further. As a matter of fact, does not the Senate pass more bills than does the House in a session?

Mr. OWEN. It is much easier for the Senate to pass bills, because of the smaller number of Members of the Senate. It is easy to pass unobjected bills in the Senate; and there are a great many bills that are brought up in the Senate that are unobjected bills. But I will say to the Senator that objected bills do not pass through the Senate.

The new majority of the Senate is honestly pledged to the people's cause, and they must carry out their pledges if they wish to retain the approval of the people of the United States.

I am in favor of majority rule.

I am in favor of making the national will immediately effective.

I am in favor of the Senate of the United States having the opportunity to do the things required by our great Nation.

I am opposed to the minority veto.

I am opposed to the discouragement of honest discussion by the invitation to minority filibuster which this rule of unlimited debate invites.

I am opposed to legislative blackmail, which this rule of unlimited debate encourages, for we have all seen the Senate consent to appropriations and important amendments to important bills which ought not to have been made, but which were made rather than jeopardize the bill by the endless debate of a Senator proposing and insisting on an amendment.

The minority veto permits the majority to be blackmailed on the most important measures in order to conciliate the unjust demands of the minority. The time has come to end this sort of unwise parliamentary procedure with its train of evil consequences.

I believe in the freedom of debate. I invite the freedom of debate; but liberty is one thing and gross abuse of liberty is another thing. Freedom of debate is a valuable principle, worthy of careful preservation, for the majority is often instructed by the minority; but freedom of debate is one thing, and uncontrolled time-killing talk and unrestrained verbosity used to enforce a factional veto is another thing.

The amendment to Rule XIX which I have proposed does not prevent reasonable debate by any Senator, but it does permit the majority, after due notice, to bring a matter to a conclusion whenever it has become obvious that the debate is not sincere, but is intended to enforce a minority veto.

Senator Vest, December 5, 1894, well said:

That these rules "coerce the Senators in charge of a bill into silence."

That "with the people of the United States demanding action we have rules here that absolutely prevent it."

That these rules "facilitate parliamentary blackmail."

That the history of the Senate is full of important amendments being put upon important bills, "under the threat that unless placed there the debate would be indefinite and almost interminable."

This rule has brought the Senate of the United States into disrepute, has greatly diminished its influence, has given it the reputation of being an obstructive body; and many men have been led to believe that the Senate was coerced and controlled by a corrupt minority. Certain it is that if a minority can exercise the veto, the corrupt interests of the country could well afford commercially to promote the election of men to the floor of the Senate, so as to obstruct legislation to which they objected.

It is the result of these very rules which has led the people of the United States to demand by a unanimous voice the direct election of Senators, so as to bring public pressure of the sovereign people on individual Members of the Senate, and compel them to respect the wishes of the people, under penalty of retirement from public life.

I pause here to say that for 90 years the people of this country have been trying to establish the rule of direct election of Senators, and it has always been the Senate that has prevented the people from having their will with regard to this matter. Five times the measure passed the House of Representatives, the last two times almost by a unanimous vote of the Members representing the people of this country in the various congressional districts; yet the Senate stood like a stone wall, refusing under these rules to carry out the will of the people of the United States. The same thing has been measurably true in regard to many other important items.

I venture now, Mr. President, seriously and solemnly to remind every Senator upon this floor who votes against this provision, who votes against majority rule in the Senate, who votes against a reasonable control by the Senate itself of its own deliberations, that he will have to answer for such vote before the people of his State, who will in the future elect the Senators by direct vote of the people and who will nominate them by direct vote of the people. And the Senator who by virtue of any precedent or prejudice opposes in this body the free right of the majority to rule will invite defeat by the majority of the people in his own State who surely believe in majority rule and will resent the support of minority rule by their Senators on this floor.

I have no fear of majority rule. I never have been afraid of majority rule. The only thing we need to fear is the rule of the minority by artifice and by wrongdoing. And I say frankly to my colleagues from the South that the black-and-white scarecrow of the force bill is a ghost for which I have no respect. We are entering a new era of majority rule, which will deal justly and generously to rich and to poor alike, and with equal generosity, justice, and mercy to men of the black race, as well as to the men of the white race, or to any other race. We need have no fear of majority rule.

Mr. President, I wish it to be clearly understood that my demand for a change of the rules of the Senate is not at all due to the idea that the adoption of such a rule is necessary in order to pass the tariff bill or any other particular bill pending or to be brought forward. My reason for this demand is that I think the welfare of the Nation requires it; that the right of the American people to a prompt redemption of party promises is involved. The right of the American people to have their will expressed at the polls promptly carried out I regard as an imperative mandate from a Nation of 90,000,000 people, and I think that a Senator who stands in the way of that mandate fails to perceive his duty to our great Nation, and that he should not be surprised if the majority, who will in future nominate Senators and elect Senators, will hold him to a strict account for a denial of the right of the majority to rule.

I remind the Senate that in three years over 30 living Senators who opposed the wishes of the American people for the direct election of Senators have been retired by the people.

PARTY PLEDGES.

The Democratic Party makes certain pledges to the people and appeals to the people for their support upon these pledges promised to be performed; the Republican Party does likewise; yet neither party, if in a majority, can control the Senate so long as the minority veto remains as a part of the rules of the Senate. If this rule is not changed, then both parties in future campaigns should put the following proviso as an addenda to their national party platforms.

Provided, however, That in making the above pledges to the American people it is distinctly to be understood by the people that we make these pledges on the understanding that the opposite party does not forbid us to carry out our promises by obstructing the fulfillment of our promise to you by filibustering in the Senate, in which event we will agree to sustain the right of the opposite party to veto the redemption of our pledges to you, by leaving the rules of the Senate in such a condition that the opposing party may veto our effort to redeem the promises made to you.

If the party trusted by the people is so imbecile as to leave the Senate itself subject to the veto of the defeated party it will deserve future defeat for such perfidious conduct.

The people of the United States have the right to rely upon the party placed by them in power to fulfill the party pledges made to the people, and if the leaders of both parties connive with each other in the Senate to sustain the minority veto under the pretense of "freedom of debate" they will have betrayed the promises made to the people, both expressed and implied. If this rule be not changed so as to establish majority rule in the Senate, and so as to enable either party to carry out its promises to the American people, then neither party responsible for such conduct deserves the confidence of the people of the United States, and the people may well say in regard to party promises made under such circumstances, as said by Macbeth in the witches scene—

> And be these juggling fiends no more believ'd
> That palter with us in a double sense;
> That keep the word of promise to our ear
> And break it to our hope.

With the consent of the Senate I submit as a part of my remarks, without reading them, several resolutions drawn by Senator Vest, Senator Platt, Senator Hoar, and others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. OWEN. Senator Vest, of Missouri, in 1893 introduced the following resolution, the most moderate form of terminating so-called debate (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 45, Dec. 5, 1894):

Amendment intended to be proposed to the rules of the Senate, namely, add to Rule I the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill, motion, or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days, amounting in all to 30, it shall be in order for any Senator to move that a time be fixed for the taking a vote upon such bill, motion, or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable, but shall be immediately put; and if adopted by a majority vote of all the Members of the Senate, the vote upon such bill, motion, or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may have been proposed at the time of such motion, shall be had at the date fixed in such original motion without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent, and during the pendency of such motion to fix a date, and also at the time fixed by the Senate for voting upon such bill, motion, or resolution, no other business of any kind or character shall be entertained, except by unanimous consent, until such motion, bill, or resolution shall have been finally acted upon."

Hon. Orville H. Platt on September 21, 1893, introduced the following resolution (p. 1636):

Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business the presiding officer shall, upon the written request of a majority of the Senators, fix a day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when general debate shall cease thereon, which time shall not be less than five days from the submission of such request, and he shall also fix a subsequent day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when the vote shall be taken on the bill or resolution and any amendment thereto without further debate, the time for taking the vote to be not more than two days later than the time when general debate is to cease, and in the interval between the closing of general debate and the taking of the vote no Senator shall speak more than five minutes, nor more than once, upon the same proposition.

And, among other things, said:

The rules of the Senate, as of every legislative body, ought to facilitate the transaction of business. I think that proposition will not be denied. The rules of the Senate as they stand to-day make it impossible or nearly impossible to transact business. I think that proposition will not be denied. We as a Senate are fast losing the respect of the people of the United States. We are fast being considered a body that exists for the purpose of retarding and obstructing legislation. We are being compared in the minds of the people of this country to the House of Lords in England, and the reason for it is that under our rules it is impossible or nearly impossible to obtain action when there is any considerable opposition to a bill here.

I think that I may safely say that there is a large majority upon this side of the Senate who would favor the adoption of such a rule at the present time.

Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts (1893), submitted to the committee a proposed substitute, as follows (p. 1637):

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for more than one day it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate, the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice shall then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure not more than once and not exceeding one hour.

"After such demand shall have been made by any Senator no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate no motion shall be in order, but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost or shall have failed of a second it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified."

Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts, also then, as now, Senator of the United States from Massachusetts, supported this proposal, using the following language (p. 1637):

It is because I believe that the moment for action has arrived that I desire now simply to say a word expressive of my very strong belief in the principle of the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt.

We govern in this country in our representative bodies by voting and debate. It is most desirable to have them both. Both are of great importance. But if we are to have only one, then the one which leads to action is the more important. To vote without debating may be hasty, may be ill considered, may be rash, but to debate and never vote is imbecility.

I am well aware that there are measures now pending, measures with reference to the tariff, which I consider more injurious to the country than the financial measure now before us. I am aware that there is a measure which has been rushed into the House of Representatives at the very moment when they are calling on us Republicans for nonpartisanship which is partisan in the highest degree and which involves evils which I regard as infinitely worse than anything that can arise from any economic measure, because it is a blow at human rights and personal liberty. I know that those measures are at hand. I know that such a rule as is now proposed will enable a majority surely to put them through this body after due debate and will lodge in the hands of a majority the power and the high responsibility which I believe the majority ought always to have. But, Mr. President, I do not shrink from the conclusion in the least. If it is right now to take a step like this, as I believe it is, in order to pass a measure which the whole country is demanding, then, as it seems to me, it is right to pass it for all measures. If it is not right for this measure, then it is not right to pass it for any other.

I believe that the most important principle in our Government is that the majority should rule. It is for that reason that I have done what lay in my power to promote what I thought was for the protection of elections, because I think the majority should rule at the ballot box. I think equally that the majority should rule on this floor—not by violent methods, but by proper dignified rules, such as are proposed by my colleague and by the Senator from Connecticut. The country demands action and we give them words. For these reasons, Mr. President, I have ventured to detain the Senate in order to express my most cordial approbation of the principle involved in the proposed rules which have just been referred to the committee.

Senator David B. Hill, of New York (1893), proposed the following amendment (p. 1639):

Add to Rule IX the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days amounting in all to 30 days, it shall be in order for any Senator to move to fix a date for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amended or debatable; and if passed by a majority of all the Senators elected the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be immediately had without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent."

Only last Congress, April 6, 1911, the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. ROOT, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to report for the consideration of the Senate a rule or rules to secure more effective control by the Senate over its procedure, and especially over its procedure upon conference reports and upon bills which have been passed by the House and have been favorably reported in the Senate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 47, pt. 1, p. 107.)

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oklahoma takes his seat, will he allow me? I notice that in the early part of his argument he referred to the fact that all, or nearly all, of the States of the Union in their several legislative assemblies limited debate, and he also referred to nearly all the parliamentary bodies of Europe as limiting debate.

Mr. OWEN. As having the right to limit debate.

Mr. POMERENE. In the course of his investigations did the Senator find any parliamentary bodies which do not limit the right of debate?

Mr. OWEN. I did. I found Greece.

Mr. POMERENE. Was there any other country?

Mr. OWEN. I found no other. Canada did have at one time unlimited debate, but since they have become more intelligent they have adopted cloture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Committee on Rules.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent that an article by Mr. R. C. Milliken concerning banking and currency be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. I rose to the request of the Senator from Colorado. Has it been acceded to?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether it was submitted or not. I have asked for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair inquired whether there was any objection to printing the matter in the RECORD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If there is any objection——

Mr. CLAPP. I do object for the present. I wish to confer with the Senator further.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right. Then let it be deferred.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—TARIFF DUTIES ON SUGAR.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

When the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] was speaking recently on the sugar tariff—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 19, page 1580—I engaged in a colloquy with him, and in the heat of debate made the following statement:

Mr. ASWELL, a Member of Congress from my State, went out West and made a number of speeches for the party, and in getting his instructions at Chicago from the national campaign committee he was told, so I am informed, that he must not discuss the question of free sugar.

This information was conveyed to me in the haste of the debate by Representative BROUSSARD, of Louisiana, who sat by me.

Within the past week I have been informed by Representative ASWELL that this statement was incorrect, and that he never received any such instructions from the national campaign committee. In fact, he said, to quote his exact words, "I understood that the Baltimore platform was the basis of discussion and so acted without any limitations offered by any person connected with the national campaign committee." Hence, I infer that Mr. BROUSSARD must have been misinformed.

I have also been advised by Postmaster General Burleson that he was in charge of the speakers' bureau at Chicago; that he instructed the various speakers himself; and that none of them was told "not to discuss the question of free sugar."

In view of what these two gentlemen say I am convinced that my statement was erroneous, and hereby correct it.

I also desire to say that no remarks of mine made during the aforesaid debate on sugar, which ran through parts of three days, were intended to impugn the motives or acts of the standard bearer of my party.

I wish it clearly understood, however, that nothing I have here said is to be construed as changing the main line of argument of my speeches, to wit, that the Baltimore platform did not contemplate or provide for free sugar.

THE TARIFF—PANIC OF 1893.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to give notice that at the close of the morning business to-morrow I shall speak upon House bill 3321 and the relation of the Wilson Tariff Act to the panic of 1893.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 15, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 14, 1913.

SECRETARIES OF LEGATIONS.

H. F. Arthur Schoenfeld, of the District of Columbia, now third secretary of the embassy at Constantinople, to be secretary of the legation of the United States of America to Paraguay and Uruguay, vice Richard E. Pennoyer, nominated to be secretary of the legation at Lima.

Richard E. Pennoyer, of California, now secretary of the legation to Paraguay and Uruguay, to be secretary of the legation of the United States of America at Lima, Peru, vice Alexander R. Magruder.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 15, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Rev. Collins Denny, D. D., of Richmond, Va., bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, offered the following prayer:

O Lord, we acknowledge Thee as the God of our fathers. We thank Thee for the way in which Thou hast led this people. We pray Thee to keep us mindful of the fact that we are constantly needing Thee. Show us the weakness which is so characteristic of us, how readily we yield to temptations to which we are subjected, how greatly we need what Thou alone canst give to us.

And now grant to the men who are here in large and responsible positions all the help they need to fulfill the obligations that rest upon them. And grant also to the people whom they represent that they may be moved with the right spirit to give support and encouragement and loyal fealty to those who are here representing in the Capital of the Nation the great affairs of this people.

Above all, we pray Thee that Thou wouldst make us Thy people, a people after Thine own heart, free from the evil that tears down national life, and clothed with the righteousness that gives perpetual existence to the people who follow after Thee.

May the blessing of God rest richly upon every Member of this Senate, upon the entire National Government, upon the whole people. We ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHARLOTTE J. HUSTED AGAINST THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 133).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the cause of Charlotte J. Husted, widow of Henry Husted, deceased, v. The United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MAY STANLEY.

Mr. BRYAN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and I submit a report (No. 81) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know from the Senator what the claim is and upon what basis a payment is asked.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Stanley was superintendent of the Indian reservation. There is a very full report prepared by the supervisor sent to investigate the matter.

Mr. GRONNA. We can not hear the Senator on this side.

Mr. BRYAN. I say, the bill is based upon the death of the superintendent of an Indian reservation. The appropriation for the amount carried in the bill was incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill and passed by the Senate, but it was stricken out in conference.

The facts, briefly stated, are that Stanley, the superintendent, when on a visit to the reservation, was murdered. Five or six Indians were tried and convicted for the murder. It seems from this very full report that some of them had formed a conspiracy to murder the superintendent when he came to the reservation. Mr. Stanley lingered after having been shot for 8 or 10 hours. He was attended by physicians and every attempt possible was made to save his life, but he died. The bill includes an appropriation to pay the physicians.

Mr. SMOOT. The House objected to the insertion of it in the appropriation bill?

Mr. CLAPP rose.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Minnesota can state fully about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The only objection to it was on the ground that it did not belong to the Indian appropriation bill. It has passed the Senate twice. I put it on the Indian appropriation bill, I know, after conference with the chairman of the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and it passed the Senate, but the House conferees objected to it. They had no objection to it except that they objected to its being on the Indian appropriation bill. It is a very meritorious case.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I realize it is a bill out of the ordinary, but it strikes me, as it did the other members of the committee who examined the bill, that it is one of those unusual cases which deserve and demand unusual treatment. If the bill is passed, I will ask consent to have incorporated in the RECORD the report of the supervisor, so that it may not be taken as a precedent in all cases.

Mr. SMOOT. The passage of the bill by the Senate is not going to hasten the passage of the bill in the House. Therefore I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to say to the Senator that near the end of the calendar there are two or three measures which will defeat the passage of calendar measures beyond that point undoubtedly for the balance of the session. I do not believe that this or any other bill that goes below the last railroad measure on the calendar will be reached on the calendar in regular order at the present session. I hope the Senator will withhold his objection. It is a very meritorious matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the Claims Committee of the House is even organized as yet?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I am advised that it is.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist upon his objection to the consideration of the bill. I am quite familiar with the circumstances. This woman was left with two or three small children and is in need. If the bill is to be passed, it is important that it should be passed as soon as possible. I see no reason why it should be delayed. It is a meritorious claim that I think the Government ought to recognize, and recognize promptly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from California what responsibility the Government has for the killing of this man?

Mr. WORKS. It has no responsibility except that he was in the regular performance of his duty, and he was shot down while he was performing his duty. If that does not give rise to a case where the Government ought to recognize the claim of his widow and children, I do not know how you can find one where it would be just and proper that it should allow the claim. It seems to me to be a just claim.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator take the position that in the case of every employee of the Government killed while in the employ of the Government his family should be paid by the Government?

Mr. WORKS. No; not necessarily; but the circumstances surrounding this transaction are such that it seems to me the Government ought to recognize this claim. It is a matter of justice.

Mr. SMOOT. These are the circumstances I wanted to know something about. If the Government is responsible, I am perfectly willing that the claim should be paid; but if the Government is not responsible, I do not see why the precedent should be established.

Mr. WORKS. I think that the precedent has been established in a good many cases already, and if there ever are cases where the Government ought to make an allowance, it seems to me that this is one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if he knows how much the claim is for?

Mr. WORKS. The chairman of the committee can state the amount.

Mr. BRYAN. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. BRYAN. Five thousand dollars for the widow, and not to exceed $1,000 for the services of the physicians.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a law on the statute book now which provides that the families of all employees on the Panama Canal who lose their lives shall be paid one year's salary. The Committee on Claims in the past has followed that rule pretty closely. In this case they are going outside of the rule entirely and giving $5,000 to the widow, and an additional amount for each child, I understand.

Mr. CLAPP. No.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, this is a very different case from those. This man Stanley had reason to believe, and undoubtedly did believe, that he was risking his life when he went upon that reservation. He was ordered to go there, and he did go, and in the performance of that hazardous duty to the Government he was shot down in cold blood by the wards of the Government.

It seems to me that that is a different case from one where a man is in a peaceful pursuit, where the dangers are not so great. If the Senator from Utah will read this record he will see that several minutes before Stanley was killed he became aware of this conspiracy. Even the night before he was killed he was invited to go to the schoolhouse. They wanted to discuss matters with him. He refrained from going there. He met them in the schoolhouse the next morning. He made a request of one of the Indians to remain and discuss with him a question with reference to a place where a road had been placed across the reservation. He told him that he wanted to discuss that matter with him. This Indian told him, in effect, that he did not care to talk with him about it, and walked out. Stanley told the Indian to come back, that he wanted to talk to him. He refused to come, and then Stanley went outside of the door and was shot down. One or two others with Stanley were shot, but not killed. Five or six of these Indians were convicted of the murder. The case shows that a conspiracy existed to murder this superintendent.

Now, that is not the usual ordinary case of a man who by misfortune is injured or loses his life while engaged in a public work.

Mr. SMOOT. How long had Mr. Stanley been superintendent of the Indian reservation?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not remember. I do not think the report shows.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I asked the question is because the Senator said Stanley was ordered to go to that Indian reservation, and that in compliance with that order he lost his life.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Knowing that in going there he took a hazardous risk.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator explain in what way it occurred.

Mr. BRYAN. The report is quite long.

Mr. SMOOT. We have not had a chance to read the report.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Senator wants to discuss it, we can do that, or he can object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the debate on the bill proceeding under unanimous consent?

Mr. BRYAN. It is. It has not been obtained yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request has not yet been granted.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to know whether the Senator from Utah is going to object to it or not.

Mr. SMOOT. From what I have already heard, I feel like objecting to the bill until the report is either read or some one has had a chance to explain it.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the bill comes from the committee with a unanimous report.

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing before the Senate to show that, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. The only thing that I rose to learn is whether objection is made, so that we may know whether we are to go on with the debate or whether the bill is to go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I have a perfect right to ask the Senator from Florida questions in relation to the bill. If not, I shall certainly object to its consideration and let it go over, so that I can read the report myself.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will yield, I suggest that at least that portion of the report which embodies the recommendation of the department be read. It will take only a moment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to address an inquiry to the Senator from Florida. Out of what fund is it proposed to pay the amount appropriated by this bill—out of a fund belonging to the Indians and in the possession of the Government or out of the revenues of the Government of the United States?

Mr. BRYAN. The bill provides for the payment to be made out of the general revenues of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If there is any fund in the United States Treasury to the credit of that particular tribe, the amount ought to be paid out of that particular fund. It ought not to be made a liability against the general revenues of the Government, and thereby set a precedent which will be continually returning here as a foundation for doing things that ought not to be done. If the Indians entered into a conspiracy to murder the superintendent of the reservation or of the school, whatever loss or inconvenience results from that ought, for its correctional value, to be suffered by the Indians.

I do not think it would be a just disposition of the matter to make the United States Government pay the amount called for out of the Treasury if the Indians have any money to their credit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. There is provision for an appropriation of $1,000 for a physician's services, as I understand.

Mr. BRYAN. It is not to exceed a thousand dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there any information as to how much those services were worth?

Mr. BRYAN. I can state to the Senator the amount of the bills rendered. It was $900.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the superintendent died within eight hours after being shot, is not that a pretty high price for the services of a physician?

Mr. BRYAN. I think so; but I will read to the Senator what the officer of the Government who made the examination reports:

> Physicians were summoned to the aid of Supt. Stanley and Selso Serrano, as follows: Dr. Martin, from Riverside; Dr. C. E. Arnold, of San Jacinto; and Dr. Straufer, of San Jacinto. They made the trip in the night over the mountains by automobile and have submitted bills as follows, for which legislation should be secured to cover:
Dr. Martin	$500
Dr. Arnold	250
Dr. Straufer	150

The bill reported to the Senate does not bind Congress to pay that amount, but to pay so much of it as may be necessary to satisfy those claims. I apprehend that if the bills are too large the department will not pay them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill can be taken up some other day by unanimous consent. If the report and the bill are all right, I certainly shall not object, but I do want to read the report. Therefore I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the report of the supervisor be printed in the RECORD, so that Senators interested in the matter may have an opportunity to examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report and bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill and report are as follows:

A bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to May Stanley, widow of Will H. Stanley, late superintendent of the Soboba Indian School, in California, who lost his life in the discharge of his duty; also to pay for medical and other necessary expenses, including funeral and administration expenses, incurred in connection with the death of said Will H. Stanley and the shooting of Selso Serrano, Indian policeman, $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

REPORT OF SUPERVISOR FRANK H. THACKERY IN RE THE MURDER OF SUPT. WILL H. STANLEY.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Carson School, Stewart, Nev., June 21, 1912.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions of your telegram of May 4, which reads in part:

"Submit detailed report giving all facts, including information why Indians refuse to recognize Government authority, and make recommendations regarding best mode of handling situation, and cooperate with United States attorney in vigorous prosecutions of parties involved in shooting, which report should contain sufficient information for department to take action for requesting congressional relief of family of Stanley and payment of medical bills of Stanley and policeman."

I arrived at the Soboba School on the morning of May 3. On May 4 I visited the Cahuilla Day School in company with Special Officer B. B. De Crevatieur and carefully investigated the situation there with especial reference to whether or not the Indians had been supplied with intoxicants on the evening prior to the murder of Supt. Stanley. Practically all of the Cahuilla Indian men were absent from the reservation at the time of this visit. I found no satisfactory evidence of the introduction of intoxicants. Five or six of the Indian men were in Riverside, where they had gone to consult with their attorney, Mr. Miguel Estudillo. The other Indians had apparently gone into the mountains fearing arrest, or possibly to the other reservations to notify their friends of the killing of Mr. Stanley and of the need of united action.

GOVERNMENT AUTHORITY OVER INDIANS.

These Cahuilla Indians have been trouble makers for many years, and it appears that they have never had superintendents or agents with whom they could agree. They have continually refused to recognize the authority of the Federal Government over them or over their landed or other property in which the Government has an interest. The better educated members of the malcontent element of these people are shrewd enough to cunningly assert that they are friendly to the Government, etc., and that their objection is against the men sent by the Government, who they claim are arbitrary and tyrannical and will let them have no voice whatever in the management of their affairs. This, however, is a mere pretext, and the real objection is unquestionably one against the authority of the Government over them rather than against any particular superintendent who has been sent to them. They have for a long time claimed the right to govern themselves, giving as their reasons the fact that they occupied this particular country prior to the coming of the white man, and that inasmuch as they and their ancestors have occupied this country for generations they are now unwilling to have the white people come in and exercise any authority over them or their property.

There are only about 30 families of the Cahuilla Indians now living on the reservation, which was set aside by an Executive order of President Grant under date of December 27, 1875. Of these 30 families, it is safe to say that 25 of them are opposed to the exercise of any Federal authority over them. They are a stubborn, independent, and self-confident people. Many of them speak English, and all speak Spanish. They possess that degree of politeness common to the Mexican people with whom they have been associated for many years. The first impression of them, therefore, either individually or collectively, and especially by anyone not connected with the Government, is likely to be favorable.

As suggested above, they have been dissatisfied with and complained of every superintendent or agent sent them by the Government. They have been outspoken in their threats against various officials of the Government, and it is reported that on one occasion they required the superintendent or teacher in charge at Cahuilla to remove a fence which he was building about the day-school premises to a point designated by them; on another occasion, when the person in charge was digging a vault for an outhouse, they required that it be filled up and dug in another place designated by them. Unfortunately these demands appear to have been complied with, even though it was apparent that the only object back of the demands was that of showing and establishing the authority which they claimed to have over the whole reservation. On another occasion they held Supt. Francis A. Swayne in his office by force for a considerable length of time attempting to intimidate and coerce him into complying with some similar request from them.

The extent or persistence of their objection to any particular superintendent appears to have been in exact proportion to the effort put forth by the superintendent in his endeavor to carry out the policy of the Government for their moral, intellectual, and industrial advancement.

LEONICIO LUGO.

For several years these Cahuilla Indians have been under the very unfortunate leadership of one Leonicio Lugo, a full-blood member of their tribe. Mr. Lugo speaks and writes the English language very well. It is perfectly apparent that his only aim is to make himself a chief or leader of all of the Mission Indians of southern California, and that he is attempting to accomplish this by uniting and securing the active support of those who have very properly been termed the "malcontents," which comprises that element of the various bands of Mission Indians who are opposed to Federal jurisdiction over their affairs. These malcontents came very prominently into existence about the time that the various superintendents of the southern California jurisdictions united, under suggestion from your office, in an earnest and energetic effort to put a stop to the unlawful liquor traffic then so common amongst these Indians, and also to stop gambling at the frequent gatherings commonly known among these Indians as "fiestas." These fiestas have been held with increasing number and interest amongst the Mission Indians for many years, and the principal feature of the fiesta appears to have been gambling in various forms. It was, therefore, and still is, particularly desirable that this degrading, improper, and unlawful practice should be stopped, and the various superintendents amongst these Mission Indians have put forth commendable effort to this end, some of them by permitting the gathering under the name of fiesta, but substituting amusements other than gambling and drinking. These Indians are natural-born gamblers, and many of them fond of intoxicants, and many of them naturally resent the action of the various superintendents in preventing these unlawful practices.

This Mr. Leonicio Lugo has been shrewd enough to grasp the opportunity, and has made it a point to visit these fiestas or other gatherings of the Indians for the purpose of uniting the malcontent element as his followers.

Since his visit to Washington about two years ago he has made all sorts of misrepresentations to these Indian people, attempting to convince them that he was able to accomplish wonders for them on this visit. As an illustration of this, the day-school teacher at Cahuilla, Mr. Carl Stevens, advised me that among other things Mr. Lugo represented upon his return that while in Washington he found out that Supt. Stanley had assisted the white people surrounding the Cahuilla Reservation in stealing from the Indians a large part of their original reservation, whereas the reservation is exactly the same to-day as it was on December 27, 1875, when set aside by President Grant. Mr. Lugo has also made many misrepresentations with reference to promises made to him while in Washington. For instance, he has claimed that the President had promised that the Cahuilla Indians should be given full title to their reservation and that they would be allowed to make their own laws and govern themselves. It is evident that Mr. Lugo failed to secure favorable action in any of the things which he claimed he could accomplish for his people, and that he has manufactured such statements as these in the hope that he can retain and increase his influence over the Mission Indians.

Mr. Lugo presents a very good appearance, but I am convinced, along with those superintendents who know him best, that he is unscrupulous, dishonest, and lazy. He has no property and cultivates no land and lives in one of the most miserable huts I have ever seen occupied by a human being. He might properly be referred to as a cancer on the Indian community for he lives almost entirely upon the labors of others and is not in any sense a producer of anything good, although he is strong and able-bodied.

It is this Leonicio Lugo who is indirectly responsible for the acts of disobedience and insubordination to former Supt. Francis A. Swayne, as set out in his letter to your office of March 20, 1911, "Education superintendencies 102298-1-1910, 12487-6-1911, Inspection, F. L. S." He is the moving spirit in opposition to real progress amongst the Indians and in the open and surprising defiance of authority. To him can be traced a large part of the troubles between the superintendents and the Indians, not only of the Soboba jurisdictions, but also of the other southern California jurisdiction, and finally, it is he who is indirectly responsible for the cold-blooded murder of Supt. Will H. Stanley. It may be that sufficient evidence can not be brought to light to convict Mr. Lugo before a court of justice, but the fact remains that he is the one who has put discontent, disloyalty, insubordination, and defiance of authority, and, I believe, murder into the minds of these people by malicious misrepresentations. He has first encouraged and later insisted that the Indians resist the authority of the superintendents and that they recognize him (Leonicio Lugo) as their supreme authority. He has even ordered the other Indians not to consult with their superintendents except through him, and he has been able to enforce this order to a considerable extent. I say, then, that these Indians were not opposed to Mr. Stanley personally, but through the efforts of Mr. Lugo they had become bitterly opposed to the authority of the Federal Government over them, and the local superintendent being the medium of expression between the Government and the Indian people, they have given expression to this opinion by defying the authority of every agent and superintendent sent to them by the Government, and finally, by the murder of Supt. Stanley, who, I can assure you, was a true friend of the Indians. I knew him well. He was of a very kindly, congenial, and happy disposition. He was efficient, loyal, and absolutely honest and was full of life and energy.

The esteem in which Mr. Stanley was held is very well shown in the various newspaper accounts of the San Jacinto Register of May 9, 1912, copy of which I submit marked "Exhibit A." He was not afraid to do his duty, no matter how trying or serious the circumstances might be, but with this he was cautious and diplomatic and entirely reasonable. His attitude toward the Cahuilla people, and particularly toward Mr. Leonicio Lugo, is clearly shown in his various communications addressed either to your office or to Mr. Lugo, copies of which were furnished you in Supt. Stanley's reply to the charges made by Mr. Lugo under date of October 25, 1911. These charges on the part of Mr. Lugo close with the following paragraph:

"I have attached affidavits here substantiating these charges, and we respectfully ask you to send us some other superintendent. We are a peaceful people and we want to obey all the rulings of your department, but we are crying out for redress and deliverance from the man you have placed over us."

The following is a true copy of a letter addressed by Mr. Lugo in his own handwriting to former Supt. F. A. Swayne, then of the Cahuilla Reservation, and further shows the attitude of Mr. Lugo in the matter of authority over these Indian people. The original letter, along with a number of others herein referred to, has been transmitted by me to the United States attorney for his use in connection with the trial for the murder of Supt. Stanley. This letter is as follows:

CAHUILLA, December 16, 1910.

Mr. F. A. SWAYNE.

DEAR SIR: You know yourself I am appointed here as the captain for the people and I have to do my duties upon the reservation as long as the people want me the captain for.

Very respectfully,

Capt. LEONICIO LUGO.

In his reply to the charges of Leonicio Lugo, Supt. Stanley states:

"I have the honor to herewith make the following explanations, taking up the letter of Leonicio Lugo first. Mr. Lugo states that 'We are willing to get along with any man who will treat us fairly and who will have patience to deal with us as we think we should be dealt with. We are not asking very much, only to be allowed to elect our own captain and our own judges, and to be allowed to remain on the lands that our forefathers lived on for generations past, given long before the white man ever coveted our country.'

"In reply, I respectfully refer to my letter to office under date of September 5, 1911, telling of my visit to Cahuilla—the reservation on which said Leonicio Lugo resides—and to inclosed letters of Lugo, and his replies, relative to the selections of their captains and their judges."

Mr. Lugo shows his determination to rule or ruin by his statement, "We are willing to get along with any man who will treat us fairly and who will have the patience to deal with us as we think we should be dealt with."

I was unable to secure copies of all of the letters referred to. However, I attach copies of all that I was able to secure, marking them "Exhibit B." Supt. Stanley continues, in his explanation of these charges, as follows:

"The facts stand out prominently that this Lugo does not desire to keep his word in this instance, but wishes to go away back into ancient history when the word of their captain and judge was law, and when these officers brought up any one of their people for any crime, either of omission or commission, and found them guilty and assessed them severely and divided the fine or spoils between them. This is a custom that Lugo and the older people are fighting for, and which this office has taken a decided and firm stand against, urging the election of these reservation officers, but also stipulating that these officers must abide by the regulations of 1904 and any other instructions that the office sent out, your regulations being the predominant law and order and not that of the tribal officer. The younger generation who have been off to school do not acquiesce in this matter unless they are frightened into it by the older people."

The strongest enemies of Leonicio Lugo amongst the Mission Indians are the returned students or educated and prosperous Indians.

Both the correspondence and my personal observations, as well as the expressions of other officials and private citizens who knew Mr. Stanley best, show clearly that he has always been a true and conscientious friend of the Indian. He was always for progress, but when he came across an obstacle to progress, as in the case of Leonicio Lugo, he was patient and sympathetic and did everything possible and within reason to win him over and enlist him also as a friend of progress and of the best interests of the Indian people. Mr. Lugo, however, has shown himself to be an impostor and anything but a true friend of his own race, which he represents himself to be. He might be partially excused for some of his acts if he were an uneducated Indian, but such is not the case. He knows the ways of the world well, but nevertheless he has been persistent in his actions which are intended to unite all of the Mission Indians of southern California in an attempt to overthrow the authority of the Federal Government over them, and all in order that he may have a little temporary fame, but more particularly to enable him to collect "easy money" from his fellow tribesmen.

THE MURDER.

After consideration of the charges made by Mr. Lugo and the answers thereto by Supt. Stanley, your office, by letter, "Education, law, and order, 4174–1912, F. L. S." dated February 20, 1912, exonerated Supt. Stanley, and inclosed a letter therewith to Mr. Lugo, which was transmitted by Supt. Stanley to Mr. Lugo on February 26, 1912, by letter, a copy of which I attach hereto and marked "Exhibit C."

It is rather significant that it was on the first visit of Supt. Stanley to the Cahuilla Reservation after the receipt of this office letter by Leonicio Lugo that he was murdered. I am unable to secure copies of either the office letter to Supt. Stanley or to Mr. Lugo.

On April 27, 1912, Supt. Stanley sent the following message:

PEDERSEN, Expert Farmer, Thermal, Cal.:

Your letter 24th. Expect to leave for Cahuilla Wednesday next. Better come in Tuesday.

STANLEY, Superintendent.

On April 28, 1912, he wrote the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
SOBOBA INDIAN SCHOOL,
San Jacinto, Cal., April 28, 1912.

Mr. JOHN LARGO,
Indian Police, Cahuilla Reservation, Cahuilla, Cal.

FRIEND LARGO: I expect to come up Wednesday next if nothing unforeseen happens. Please find out where all of the Government bulls are at Cahuilla so that we may brand them when I come up. Get two or three men to assist us. I will not be able to pay them anything for the work, but I think they ought to be willing to help for the use of the cattle. Selso will be up with me along with David and Jose Juan, and I think we can take care of the bulls all right. I received the $20 from Mr. Stevens all right and want to thank you for the favor. Tell Mr. Stevens that I will be up next Wednesday and that I would write him, but I have not time before mail to-day. We will take up the matter of the road that Cornelio is building when I come up.

Very hastily,

WILL H. STANLEY, Superintendent.

The envelope attached to this letter shows it to have been mailed on the same day that it was written.

The matter of branding Government stock is referred to in office circular No. 608, and in the letter of Supt. Stanley addressed to your office on March 24, 1912, copy of which is hereto attached and marked "Exhibit D." It appears that Mr. Stanley had arranged with Additional Farmer C. A. Pedersen to accompany him on this trip for the purpose of taking up various matters on the Cahuilla Reservation, one of which was the branding of the Government stock there. On April 29, 1912, your office wired Supt. Stanley as follows:

INDIAN SCHOOL, San Jacinto, Cal.:

Submit complete report with respect attitude of malcontents on Cahuilla Reservation with recommendation concerning action.

HAUKE,
Second Assistant Commissioner.

Supt. Stanley answered this telegram on April 30, as follows:

Your telegram April 29 relative to malcontents at Cahuilla Reservation. Am leaving for this reservation to-day and will forward report upon return.

STANLEY, Superintendent.

It appears that Supt. Stanley arrived at the day school on the Cahuilla Reservation on the evening of May 1 in company with C. A. Pedersen, agency farmer, and Selso Serrano, forest guard and special police. It is claimed that some of the leaders amongst the malcontents invited Mr. Stanley, Carl Stevens, the day-school teacher, and Mr. Pedersen out to an Indian war dance at one of the Indian's homes near the Cahuilla day school on this same evening (May 1), and that later developments show that it was the intention of the Indians, in case the invitation was accepted, to get into some sort of controversy with them as an excuse for leading up to a fight, which was to result in the murder or killing of the three white men named.

Although I believe that the murder of Supt. Stanley was premeditated, I did not find satisfactory proof of the above plan. When considered in connection with some of the circumstances and subsequent developments, however, it appears that such a scheme may have been in the minds of the Cahuilla people. These Indians are wise enough to know that there would be less evidence against them in an act of this kind if they could consummate the crime at night when it was dark and at a time when there would be no witnesses except the parties to the affair. The attempt on the following morning to kill Carl Stevens and Mr. Pedersen, as well as the two Indian police, immediately following the fatal shot at Mr. Stanley, must have represented an attempt on their part to get rid of all witnesses who might later appear against them in the prosecution.

Mr. Stevens had heretofore been on very friendly terms with all of these people and Mr. Pedersen was a stranger to them, and the unusual bravery and loyalty of the two Indian officers, John Largo and Selso Serrano, convinced the leaders of this affair that they must get rid of them also if possible in order to lessen the chance for their conviction in the trial to follow. At any rate it is certain that several of these leaders in the fight, led by Ambrosia Apapas, made a strenuous effort to kill Mr. Stevens, Mr. Pedersen, and the two Indian officers after the fatal shot at Supt. Stanley.

When Apapas shot Mr. Stanley, a number of remarks were heard from the onlookers, such as "Give him another one" and "Shoot him again." It seems, therefore, quite reasonable to suppose that they may have had similar intentions on the evening before. Be this as it may, neither of the three men attended the Indian dance on the night of May 1.

After Mr. Stanley's arrival at the day school he sent Policeman John Largo, on the same evening (May 1), to notify Mr. Cornelio Lubo to come to the day school on the following morning for consultation. Mr. Stanley did not call a general meeting of the Indians, and the only person sent for was this Cornelio Lubo. On the following morning (May 2), however, all of the men then on the Cahuilla Reservation came in a body, there being about 25 of them, headed by Leonicio Lugo as their leader and spokesman. They arrived at the day school about 8 o'clock in the morning, and Leonicio Lugo called at once at the cottage of the day school-teacher, where Mr. Stanley had spent the night, and asked if Supt. Stanley was there. Being advised by Mr. Stevens that he was, Mr. Lugo stated that they would like to see him. Mr. Stanley then appeared upon the porch and greeted Mr. Lugo, saying that he would be glad to see them and suggesting that they go to the school building (about 4 rods away), where they would find plenty of seats, and adding that he would be there in a few moments. Accordingly, Mr. Stanley went down to the school building about 8.30 or 9 o'clock in the morning, and was accompanied by Carl Stevens and C. A. Pedersen. Selso Serrano was in the schoolroom from the beginning of the meeting, but the other officer, Mr. Largo, did not arrive until some time after the meeting had started. Ignacio Costa, the regular interpreter for the malcontent element, acted as interpreter for the Indians. Leonicio Lugo was the first to speak, and at once demanded, in an unfriendly and improper way, to know why Supt. Stanley had sent for Cornelio Lubo the night before and what he was wanted for.

It appears that Cornelio Lubo had changed a public road which had been worked and used by the public for many years, and that he had done so in defiance of the authority of Supt. Stanley, who had previously experienced some difficulty in the closing or changing of public roads by the Indians without their first securing proper authority. This, no doubt, is the matter referred to in the last sentence of Supt. Stanley's letter to John Largo, above quoted, wherein he says, "We will take up the matter of the road that Cornelio is building when I come up." It appears also that some time prior to this Leonicio Lugo had changed a public road without proper authority.

Replying to Leonicio Lugo, Supt. Stanley advised him in effect that he wished to discuss a private matter with Cornelio Lubo and that it did not concern the other Indians, and that he and Cornelio would discuss this matter privately later on. Mr. Lugo then advised Supt. Stanley, in a very insubordinate and boastful manner, that he, Leonicio Lugo, was in full authority and control of the Cahuilla Reservation, and that he (Supt. Stanley) had no authority whatever there; that if Supt. Stanley wished to discuss any matter with any of the Cahuilla Indians it must be done only through him (Leonicio Lugo). Mr. Lugo also informed Supt. Stanley in the same improper way that he had heard that he (Stanley) had come up to brand the Government bulls, to which Mr. Stanley replied that it was true that this was one of the purposes of his visit, and he further explained that he was acting under instructions from your office (see Circular No. 608, supra) in doing so. Mr. Lugo first said they would refuse to permit the bulls to be branded, but when Supt. Stanley insisted that it must be done, Mr. Lugo then told Mr. Stanley that if he branded the bulls he must immediately remove them from the reservation. Supt. Stanley had with him his office copy of the Indian Office Regulations of 1904 and also a copy of the Indian school rules.

When I visited the day school, on May 4, I found these still in the room where the meeting was held with the Indians, and in the regulations were several marked paragraphs which Supt. Stanley had carefully explained, through the interpreter, to the Indians, and which should have convinced them that his position in the matters under discussion was correct and in harmony with the law and the regulations governing the Indian department. The two policemen, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Pedersen, all state that Mr. Stanley was particularly careful to go into detail in explaining these acts of Congress and the regulations for their enforcement, and especially to have the Indians understand that he was not the maker of these laws and regulations, but was the person designated by the Government to put them into operation.

The following Indians made speeches at the meeting, all "lining up" with the ideas as advanced by Leonicio Lugo, the first speaker, some of them urging such action as to drag Stanley out by the hair into the road and put him off the reservation: Leonicio Lugo, Ambrosio Apapas, Francisco Lubo, Cornelio Lubo, Pablino Lubo, Apapito Lubo, Servantos Lubo, Pio Lubo, and Charley Arenas. Some of the stronger remarks or demands appear not to have been interpreted to Mr. Stanley, and he did not know of them until after he was shot.

After the discussion regarding the branding of the Government bulls, Supt. Stanley began to explain to them that Mr. Selso Serrano had recently been appointed by your office as a forest guard, and that his duties as such would be to supervise and protect the timber on their reservation, and asking the assistance of the Indians; but they refused to listen further to his statements, and broke up the meeting by leaving the room in an attitude of contempt for Mr. Stanley. As they left they remarked that they were going to drive the Government bulls up to the day school, and that Supt. Stanley must brand them while the Indians were still there, and that he must then drive them off of the reservation immediately. Just as the Indians were leaving the room Mr. Stanley called to Cornelio Lubo, saying, "Wait a minute, Cornelio, I want to see you." It will be remembered that Cornelio Lubo is the man whom Supt. Stanley expected to see about the road. Cornelio pretended not to hear Mr. Stanley, who then instructed Policeman John Largo to "tell Cornelio Lubo I want to see him." Mr. Largo so informed Cornelio Lubo as he (Lubo) was going out of the school building through the little hallway at the front entrance, and as Mr. Largo delivered Mr. Stanley's message Cornelio gave Mr. Largo a contemptuous shove against the wall. Mr. Largo then informed Supt. Stanley that Cornelio Lubo would not come and was then directed by Mr. Stanley in effect to "Go bring him in."

Mr. Largo went back and, finding Cornelio Lubo outside talking with several other men, took him by the arm, asking him to come into the school building to see Mr. Stanley. Cornelio Lubo resisted violently and took hold of Policeman Largo and was immediately assisted by five other Indians, to wit: Francisco Lubo, Pio Lubo, Apapito Lubo, Pablino Lubo, and Servantos Lubo. (There is comparatively a large number of Lubos on the Cahuilla Reservation, but they represent a number of different families not related to each other.) As soon as they had him down and held tightly, Cornelio Lubo kicked Policeman Largo severely on the back of the neck, evidently intending to kill him. Francisco Lubo took Mr. Largo's six-shooter or revolver by force. Just at this time Mr. Carl Stevens noticed, through the open door of the school building, that the Indians had overpowered Policeman Largo and so advised Supt. Stanley, who then directed Selso Serrano to assist Largo. Serrano ran out of the building some distance ahead of Mr. Stanley, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Pedersen. As Serrano stepped out of the building Francisco Lubo made for him with the gun he had taken from Officer Largo, firing (at least one, and it is believed two shots) at Serrano, but missing. Serrano fired into the air, then into the ground, trying to stop Francisco Lubo. Either the second or the third shot of Serrano glazed the knee of Francisco Lubo, who was then within 5 or 6 feet of Serrano. I examined this wound on the knee of Francisco Lubo in the Federal jail at Los Angeles on May 6 in company with a deputy United States marshal and Inspector W. L. Dorr. It is certain that the bullet struck the knee from above, showing that the gun of Serrano was pointed downward when he fired and not intended to do serious injury. The bullet had barely cut through his trousers and underclothing, only burning the flesh of the knee and not even causing him to limp when he walked.

This shows conclusively, I think, that Serrano was trying faithfully to do his duty without serious results. By this time Supt. Stanley, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Pedersen were on the little porch in front of the school building, and Supt. Stanley was calling to the men, "Don't shoot, boys." At this point Ambrosio Apapas (who is claimed by Serrano to have had a gun of his own) grabbed the gun from Francisco Lubo and shot Serrano in the left side, almost directly over the heart, the bullet apparently striking a rib, which caused it to glance and follow, on the outside of the rib, around the body to a point very near the spine, from whence it was later removed by the attending physicians. At the time this was done Supt. Stanley was still calling to the men, and especially to Serrano, "Don't shoot," and while Mr. Stanley was thus pleading with them Ambrosio Apapas turned, after shooting Serrano, and made for Supt. Stanley, who was still standing on the little platform in front of the school building, the platform being elevated about 3½ or 4 feet above the surface of the ground. When Mr. Stanley saw Apapas approaching, with gun in hand ready to shoot, he put up both hands, calling to Apapas, "Don't shoot me; I'm unarmed;" all of which failed to make any impression on Apapas, unless it was to strengthen his evident determination to murder Mr. Stanley and his associates. Seeing that Apapas intended to kill him, Mr. Stanley turned to retreat into the school building, at the same time apparently dodging down, and while in this position he was shot in the back by Apapas.

In his dying statement Supt. Stanley indicates that he was shot after entering the building. This, however, I am fully convinced is a mistake, for a survey of the ground, with all other available information, shows clearly that he was shot as above outlined.

Apapas immediately followed Mr. Stevens and Mr. Pedersen into the school building, firing at them as they escaped through a door in the rear of the classroom into the dining room. This bullet passed through the front flap of the coat of Mr. Pedersen, going very close to the body of both Pedersen and Stevens, who were crowded closely together (Stevens in front of Pedersen) in their attempt to escape. The door slammed behind them, and Apapas had some difficulty in getting it open, thus giving them time to escape unnoticed into a small room (a china or linen closet) off of the dining room and to close the door behind them before Apapas was able to get the door open. When Apapas got the door opened and passed into the dining room he evidently supposed they had gone through another door leading outdoors from the dining room, and rushing through that door came again on to Serrano, upon whom he again opened fire. The bullet which Apapas shot at Stevens and Pedersen went through the blackboard (after passing through Pedersen's coat) into the wall on the inside of the schoolroom, from whence I removed it. I gave it to Mr. Pedersen for use in connection with his testimony in court. After Apapas and Serrano had emptied their guns, Serrano retreated into some brush or behind some rocks near by, and Apapas turned and made for Policeman John Largo, who was then being held by several Indians.

As Apapas approached Largo, he kept pulling the trigger of his gun, then empty, and demanding that some one furnish him cartridges with which to kill Largo. Just as Apapas reached Largo he was intercepted by Charley Arenas, who disarmed him. (Charley Arenas is said to be a relative of Policeman John Largo. He has been closely associated with the malcontents on the Cahuilla Reservation, however, for several years, and during the meeting was one of the most boisterous ones and is believed to have called to Apapas as he, Apapas, shot Mr. Stanley to "give him another one.")

This ended the affair, and the Indians left the day school to go to their homes. After consultation with each other, and acting, no doubt, under the advice of Leonicio Lugo, seven of the Indian men left during the night for Riverside, where, it appears, they had planned to have a consultation with their attorney, Mr. Miguel Estudillo, before mentioned, hoping, through his assistance, to bring about the arrest of the two Indian officers, Largo and Serrano, on the pretext that these officers had caused the trouble, wounded Francisco Lubo, and claiming also that it was one of these officers who shot Mr. Stanley. Instead of going to Riverside over the most frequented and better road they took a very out-of-the-way trail which was seldom used. The party headed for Riverside consisted of Leonicio Lugo, supposed captain; Juan Costa, supposed judge; Felix Tortes, Santos Lubo, Ambrosio Apapas, Pio Apapas, and Francisco Lubo. They were overtaken at Perris, Cal., by the county sheriff, and Leonicio Lugo has since been smart enough, either through his own intelligence or through the advice of others, to advance the theory that he was bringing Ambrosio Apapas and Francisco Lubo to Riverside to turn them over to the sheriff.

CASE BEFORE THE GRAND JURY.

In harmony with your instructions I cooperated with and assisted Inspector W. L. Dorr in bringing the matter of the murder of Mr. Stanley forcibly to the attention of the United States attorney at Los Angeles, who advised us before I left that there would be little question as to the indictment and conviction of Ambrosia Apapas and Francisco Lubo on the charge of murder, and I am recently in receipt of a letter from Inspector Dorr saying that he had just been advised by the United States attorney that he (the United States attorney) expected the indictment of eight or nine Indians in all under the same charge. It is particularly unfortunate that as yet we have not been able to secure sufficient evidence to bring Leonicio Lugo to trial, for I think that he is the prime mover in the whole affair. In this connection I call your special attention to the letters shown in Exhibit B.

MEDICAL BILLS.

Physicians were summoned to the aid of Supt. Stanley and Selso Serrano, as follows: Dr. Martin, from Riverside; Dr. C. E. Arnold, of San Jacinto; and Dr. Straufer, of San Jacinto. They made the trip in the night over the mountains by automobile and have submitted bills as follows, for which legislation should be secured to cover:

Dr. Martin	$500
Dr. Arnold	250
Dr. Straufer	150

The doctors were agreed, after an examination, that Mr. Stanley had only a slight chance of recovery and that the one chance would be through an operation, which was performed between midnight and 3 o'clock in the morning of May 3. Mr. Stanley died about 4.30 or 5 o'clock on the morning of May 3. Before dying he made an antemortem or dying statement, which is shown in the copy of the testimony taken at the coroner's inquest, and attached hereto and marked "Exhibit E." This statement was written by Dr. C. E. Arnold, and evidently is not as accurate, full, and complete as it should be, although Dr. Arnold is to be commended for urging that such a statement be made. Mr. Stanley was at the time in such severe pain that it was almost out of the question for him to dictate an intelligent statement of the affair. The original has been turned over to the United States attorney for his use in connection with the trial. Exhibit E shows the nature of the wound as testified to by the attending physicians.

CONGRESSIONAL AID NEEDED.

Mr. Stanley left as his only heirs at law his wife, May Bessie Stanley, age 31; his son, Arnold Archibald Stanley, age 12 (born June 28, 1899); and his daughter, Constance Elenor Stanley, age 8 (born Aug. 6, 1903).

Mr. Stanley left no life insurance for his family. The only property left by him for his heirs is represented in two lots in Los Angeles, which are valued at about $1,500 each, but on one of the lots he had paid only about $130 and on the other he still owed $750. Thus you will see that the family is left almost without anything for their support. In addition to this Mrs. Stanley is not in good health.

Inasmuch as Supt. Stanley died in the faithful, conscientious, and efficient performance of his duties, I want to especially urge that the office insist upon such legislation as will provide a pension to the family or widow of Mr. Stanley at not less than $600 per annum, subject to the same conditions under which pensions are granted to officers or men of the Regular Army.

RECOGNITION OF FAITHFUL INDIAN OFFICERS.

The unusual loyalty and faithfulness of Seiso Serrano and John Largo should be recognized by promotion. Mr. Largo should be retained as a police officer at a salary of at least $50 per month and Mr. Serrano should be made a permanent forest guard at $720 per annum.

In recognition for loyalty and efficiency during this affair Mr. and Mrs. Carl Stevens and Mr. C. A. Pedersen should receive a letter from your office commending them for faithful service during a trying ordeal.

HANDLING THE SITUATION.

I want also to urge upon your office the advisability of some early and special arrangement to handle the situation with reference to the "malcontent" element now existing and increasing amongst the various reservations of the Mission Indians of southern California. I believe that it is advisable and necessary to appoint a special attorney for the Mission Indians of southern California whose duties should be to cooperate with the superintendents of the various reservations, not only in protecting the Indians in their rights, but also in the enforcement of the Federal or other laws governing them.

I found the United States attorney's office at Los Angeles very willing to cooperate in every way possible in this matter, but the situation is such as to demand that there be some legal representative of the Government "on the ground" in order to "strike while the iron is hot." It is my judgment that there will be further trouble with these malcontent Indians, especially at the Soboba, Volcan, Malki, and Martinez jurisdictions, unless the office takes some early and decisive action to "back up" the various superintendents in better establishing and maintaining control over these Indians. An attorney on the ground for one or two years, with authority to bring proper actions for the protection of the Indians' interests and also to compel them to obey the laws governing Indian affairs, will, I believe, clear up a bad situation.

Very respectfully, FRANK A. THACKERY, Supervisor.

BELL OF U. S. S. "PRINCETON."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. In connection with the joint resolution, I desire to say that I have two letters relating to the joint resolution, which I ask to have read—one from the Secretary of the Navy and the other from the clerk of the borough of Princeton.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to loan the bell of the late U. S. S. Princeton to the borough of Princeton, N. J., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the borough of Princeton, N. J., the bell of the old U. S. S. Princeton, which the Navy Department loaned the borough of Princeton for use in the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the borough.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say, Mr. President, that at my request the bell of the steamship Princeton was loaned to the borough of Princeton on its one hundredth anniversary. The people in that borough became so much interested in it that a movement was set on foot to request the Secretary of the Navy to loan it permanently to the borough for the purposes of exhibition. There is located there the house which was formerly the home of Commodore Stockton, who, by the way, commanded the steamship Princeton. It is now a public museum, and it is desired that this bell may be placed there as an object of interest to the whole neighborhood, as well as to the State of New Jersey at large. I communicated the request of these people to Secretary of the Navy Daniels and have received from him a letter, which, together with one from the borough clerk of Princeton, I have sent to the Secretary's desk and request that they be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letters referred to by the Senator from New Jersey? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 12, 1913.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE, United States Senator,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, inclosing a letter from the borough clerk of Princeton, N. J., in reference to the bell of the old U. S. S. Princeton, which the Navy Department loaned the borough some time ago.

It is noted that it is now desired to have the bell loaned the borough as a permanent exhibit, and that they have a suitable place and ample facilities for caring for it.

The department knows of no objection to the loan of the bell for the purpose stated; but in view of the historical character of the bell, it is believed that the loan should be accomplished by means of a joint resolution as suggested within, which I will be glad to indorse.

The letter of the borough clerk is returned herewith as requested.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

BOROUGH OF PRINCETON,
MAYOR'S OFFICE,
Princeton, N. J., July 7, 1913.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MARTINE: Through your public spirit the bell of the U. S. S. Princeton was loaned to us by the Navy Department on the occasion of the recent celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the borough of Princeton. The enthusiasm and widespread interest in the bell not only of our citizens but also of the large number of visitors from the adjacent counties was so great that a movement was immediately started to keep the bell here for the present.

As you had accomplished so much by your prompt and energetic action, it seemed not only logical but proper to again enlist your aid to attain the wishes of our citizens. As all public property is tied up with red tape, it would appear at this distance that the most direct method would be to introduce a joint resolution in the House and Senate authorizing the Navy Department, if not incompatible with public interests, to loan the bell permanently to the borough of Princeton, subject to recall should it be found necessary in the future. This has been done repeatedly, we understand, and there is abundant precedent for it.

Fortunately there is at hand a most suitable place for its care and preservation. The widow of the late Senator John R. Thomson, who served our State so ably in the Senate (1853–1862), at her death bequeathed her handsome residence, which is on the main street of the town and surrounded by beautiful grounds, to the citizens of Princeton, under control of trustees. Thomson Hall is now used as a public library, for band concerts in summer, and for various meetings of a public character. The bell, which is of no use whatever to the Navy Department, and was stored in a building at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, would thus be given a place of high honor, where it would be viewed by thousands of visitors from all sections of the country, who annually come to visit our great university. Moreover, its possession, even as a loan, would be most gratifying to all the citizens not only of Princeton but of the surrounding towns as well. Another reason, if any be needed, is that Commodore Robert F. Stockton, who supervised the construction of the Princeton and was her first captain, was a native of this town and a brother-in-law of Senator Thomson, so Thomson Hall, in the borough of Princeton, would seem to be the natural resting place of the bell, which would also be a fitting memorial to so distinguished a naval officer as Capt. Stockton.

We have written to Congressman ALLAN B. WALSH, our Representative in the House, requesting him to confer with you in this matter and acquainting him with all the details in the case. An additional letter will be sent to the Secretary of the Navy, informing him of the interest taken in the service by the citizens of the State of New Jersey, of the wisdom of keeping the deeds of the Navy alive in this university town, and requesting him to aid the joint resolution by a favorable indorsement.

The local interest in this matter is so great that I will come to Washington if you will kindly name a day and hour when you can conveniently see me and talk this over. We feel that your public spirit, of which you have given so many instances in the past, will sympathize with us in this matter, and we are sure that in applying to you we will receive your hearty cooperation.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. C. C. ZAPF,
Borough Clerk.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the thought has been suggested to me by a brother Senator that this bell might be presented to the borough of Princeton rather than loaned for exposition purposes, and I desire that the suggestion may be incorporated as a part of the joint resolution—that the bell be presented to the borough of Princeton, N. J., for purposes of exhibition.

I ask most respectfully that immediate consideration be given to the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration to the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand from the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey that his desire is that this should be in the nature of a permanent loan?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And that the Navy Department would, therefore, have jurisdiction over the bell?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand from the reading of the joint resolution that such is not the case, but that it is to be a gift.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; in the joint resolution I have provided that the bell is to be loaned to the borough of Princeton. Afterwards I asked, upon the suggestion of a brother Senator, that the joint resolution be modified to provide that the bell should be presented to the borough of Princeton for purposes of exhibition.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I rose, Mr. President, to call attention to the fact that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy contemplates one thing, and the suggestion of the brother Senator, to whom the Senator from New Jersey refers, contemplates another thing.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I realize that is true, and I withdraw my latter proposition with reference to the bell being a gift and will allow the joint resolution to remain as originally drawn, that the bell be loaned to the borough of Princeton. They have a splendid museum to which the bell will be a credit, and I think the people will be proud of it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARY OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. BRISTOW. I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 132) was read, as follows:

Whereas from 1789 to 1799 the salary of the Secretary of State was $3,500 per annum, during which period the office was occupied by Thomas Jefferson and Edmund Randolph; and

Whereas from 1799 to 1819 the salary of the Secretary of State was $5,000 per annum, during which period the office was occupied by such eminent statesmen as John Marshall, James Madison, James Monroe, and John Quincy Adams; and

Whereas from 1819 to 1853 the salary of the Secretary of State was $6,000 per annum, during which period the office was occupied by such eminent statesmen as Henry Clay, Martin Van Buren, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, and James Buchanan; and

Whereas from 1853 to 1911 the salary of the Secretary of State was $8,000 per annum, during which period that high office was occupied by such eminent statesmen as William H. Seward, James G. Blaine, Thomas F. Bayard, Walter Q. Gresham, Richard Olney, John Sherman, John Hay, and ELIHU ROOT; and

Whereas during this long period of time no one of these eminent statesmen was compelled to neglect the duties of the office because of the meagerness of the salary; and

Whereas during the year 1911 the salary of the Secretary of State was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 per annum; and

Whereas the "Great Commoner" now holding that high office, Hon. W. J. Bryan, has stated in the public press that the salary of $1,000 per month is not sufficient to enable him to live with comfort, and that because of the meagerness of the salary of $12,000 per annum he is compelled to neglect the duties of his office and go upon the lecture platform in order to earn a living; and

Whereas there are now pending before the Department of State matters of the highest importance to the Nation, affecting the relations of our country with Mexico, Japan, England, and other foreign countries that demand the most earnest, careful, and continuous attention of the Secretary of State: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to advise the Senate what would be a proper salary to enable the present Secretary of State to live with comfort and to enable him to give his time to the discharge of his public duties for which he is now being paid the sum of $1,000 per month; and be it further

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to give this subject as prompt attention as his convenience will permit in order that Congress may take immediate steps to relieve the country from the great loss which it suffers by being deprived of the services of the present Secretary of State, though it is now paying for such services at the rate of $1,000 per month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KERN. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, I should like to ask, as a mere matter of curiosity, who is the personal author of that delightful piece of humor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution was presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. That is all the Chair knows about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The resolution was prepared and presented by myself, and, in my weak way, I undertook to express my views and recite some historical facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have known the Senator from Kansas for a long time and respect him very highly, but I never suspected before this morning that he was capable of that amount of irony, sarcasm, and humor all in one resolution, especially in the "whereases" of the resolution. So I am almost tempted to ask the Senator from Kansas if he did not obtain help of some sort in preparing that resolution? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, that is a somewhat personal question, and of course if it were asked by any other Senator than the Senator from Mississippi, I should decline to answer, but I can not refuse to answer any question which he may ask me. I must confess that no one is responsible for a word contained in the resolution except myself, and I very gladly assume the responsibility, because it seems to me that the author and the promoter of the idea of the "dollar dinner," concerning which we have recently heard so much, should himself and wife now be able to live very comfortably in the Capital of the Nation on $1,000 a month. It is with great regret that we are to be deprived of the services of the distinguished Secretary of State——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, a question of order.

Mr. BRISTOW (continuing). For the first time in the history of the country a Secretary of State, because the Nation refuses to pay a sufficient amount to enable him to live comfortably, though I am free to say that he is now receiving the same salary as other Cabinet officers——

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have the floor, I believe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from Indiana has raised the question of order.

Mr. KERN. The point of order is that the resolution was offered, and, under the rules, it goes over, if there is objection. An objection was made; therefore the resolution is not before the Senate for discussion, but Senators are proceeding to discuss it. I insist they are out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that Senators were proceeding by consent. There being an objection, they are out of order, and the discussion should cease.

Mr. BRISTOW. The discussion, I understand, is in order unless something else is being done. I should like to appeal to my good friend the Senator from Indiana to permit this resolution to pass.

Mr. KERN. The "Senator from Indiana" has exercised his right to object to the present consideration of the resolution. The resolution goes over under the rule. When it comes up in proper form perhaps the "Senator from Indiana" will be prepared to say something on the subject of the resolution. But until the proper time comes for the consideration of the resolution it can not be considered, unless the rules are entirely ignored.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, if the Senator will not yield to my solicitation to withdraw his objection, I realize that his objection will put the resolution over. I was endeavoring, however, to answer the question of my friend from Mississippi to the best of my ability; and there being nothing else occupying the attention of the Senate, I was very glad to respond to his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana having objected, the resolution will go over; and as there seems to be objection to the discussion of the question between the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Kansas, the Chair is compelled to hold that it is out of order.

Mr. BRISTOW. That may be; but the Senator from Mississippi has the floor. If he desires to discuss anything else, I shall be very glad to answer his questions so far as I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if it has been finally determined that I have the floor, I want to add only one word.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a point of order. I understand objection has been made to the further consideration of the resolution. Of course, under the rule, the objection carries it over. I certainly think the rule ought to apply to all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it will add to the delectation of the Senator, I shall not add even the other one word; but if I am in order, I should like to add it.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions.

COTTON BAGGING AND COTTON TIES.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration, if the matter seems to be of sufficient importance.

The resolution (S. Res. 134) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, directed to investigate the recent advance in price of bagging used in baling cotton, also the advance in price of ties used in banding or baling cotton, and to report to the Senate at the earliest possible time the cause or causes for said advances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution submitted by him. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the new tariff bill is going to put cotton bagging upon the free list and deal correspondingly with cotton ties, I think this investigation will cause the expenditure of a lot of money without any real justification for it. I therefore object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just a moment. I should like to state to the Senator from Mississippi, before he objects, that I have in my hand certain communications which will throw a different light on this question, in view of the fact that even though the tariff bill passes, as we all know it will, it must go over this season.

I have here communications from dealers in bagging throughout the South saying that right now the price has advanced from 2 cents a yard to 2½ cents, making practically 15 cents a bale advance over the price of 1912. In my State alone that advance will amount to something like $160,000 or $170,000 for the article of bagging alone. In the State of Georgia it will approximate $300,000. Some of the letters I have in my possession indicate that if any relief is to come it must come now; and an immediate investigation might disclose the fact that the production of these articles is entirely controlled by a trust, which furnishes from its mills all the bagging used in this great Republic.

With the consent of the Senate, I am going to read some of these letters. They are short. One of them reads:

Your letter to the Abbeville Hardware Co. came to me, as I have been winding up their business. In reply to your inquiry in reference to the price of cotton bagging, will say that the price will be much higher this season than last, on account of speculators getting control of stocks on hand; and I am of opinion that it will be at least 50 per cent higher than it was last year.

From Florence, S. C., I have this:

In reply to yours of the 8th instant in reference to the price on cotton bagging and ties, the 1912 price on 2-pound bagging delivered was $8.48; ties, 95 cents. The 1913 price on bagging of exactly the same kind is $10.12½, and ties $1.03½.

The writer also gives an itemized statement.

Here is one from another State:

Replying to your favor of the 8th, I beg to say that new jute bagging is quoted 2 cents a yard higher this season than last season; ties about 16 per cent higher.

From Allendale, S. C.:

In reply to your letter of the 8th, cotton bagging is worth this year 10½ cents. Last year it could be bought for 9½.

This letter is from Charleston, S. C.:

Replying to yours of the 8th instant in matter of cotton bagging, would advise that the difference between opening price 1912 and 1913 shows an advance of 2 cents per yard on standard 2-pound bagging. Opening price June, 1912, standard 2-pound, 8¼ cents per yard; July, 1913, standard 2-pound, 10¼. During September and October there was an advance of 1¼ cents per yard, and since opening of the present season, July 1, 1913, there have been two advances, one-fourth of a cent per yard each, or a total advance of one-half of a cent per yard.

From Lynchburg, S. C.:

Your favor under date of 8th instant received and noted. In reply, beg to state that 2-pound jute bagging is about 2 cents higher this year over last. I am unable to account for this advance, except that the price of bagging is controlled by the trusts. I certainly hope you will be able to give us some relief along this line, for it seems that we are entirely at the mercy of the trusts at present.

Here is a letter from Dillon, S. C.:

Your letter to hand regarding cotton bagging. Yes; I have bought my bagging for this season, and it has cost me 2 cents per yard more than I paid for the same brand last year. I bought the same bagging last season at 8¼; this season, 10¼.

Here is another letter from Charleston, dated July 10:

Agreeably to your esteemed favor of the 8th instant, now before us, we have the pleasure of advising you that about this time last year American quality of jute bagging was quoted and sold at 8⅞ cents per yard for 2-pound weight and for Dundee quality 8⅛ per yard for 2-pound weight. To-day's quotations are 10½ per yard for American quality for 2-pound weight and 10 cents per yard for Dundee quality for 2-pound weight.

This letter is from Timmonsville, S. C.:

Replying to your favor of July 8, beg to say that 2-pound new jute bagging is 2½ cents higher this July than it was last July. The opening price was 2 cents higher than last year, but it has since advanced a half cent, and the probability is that it will still go higher.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I hope we may have order in the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have in my hand quite a number of letters covering different portions of the cotton belt. Complaint is coming in that they are——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I again ask that order may be had in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will kindly be in order, and those who are not Senators will please be seated. The Sergeant at Arms will see that the rules of the Senate are enforced.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a question of order. Does a demand for order include a demand for the regular order? I will ask the Senator from Georgia to enlighten me on that point. If it is a demand for the regular order, of course the Senator from South Carolina is out of order.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator from Wyoming understood what I said. I did not use the words "regular order," and I had no reference to the order of business, as the Senator is very well aware.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BACON. That is another matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, may I be permitted to ask the Senator from Mississippi, in view of the facts I have just stated, if he will not withdraw his objection and let this investigation be made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to state to the Senator from South Carolina that the Senator from Wyoming has called for the regular order, and the resolution will go over.

SALARY OF ASSISTANT COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 133), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be authorized to employ one of his three assistant clerks, each now drawing a salary of $1,440 per annum under the act of March 4, 1913, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, the difference of $560 to be paid from miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided by law.

SAFETY-APPLIANCE INSPECTION.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 135), which was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas there are in the United States approximately 2,300,000 freight and passenger cars, distributed over thousands of tracks in every section of the Union, and only 32 safety-appliance inspectors; and

Whereas the force now employed is evidently inadequate for the proper performance of the duties required, and defective appliances are still producing an appalling loss of life and limb; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to investigate these conditions and report to the Senate the additional number of safety-appliance inspectors necessary to an adequate performance of the work of safety-appliance inspection on the railroads of the United States.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 136), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to suggest to the nations of the world the appointment of national representatives to attend an international conference, to be held at such time and place as may be found convenient, with a view to bringing about a temporary suspension of the construction of war vessels and implements of war, a general limitation on war preparation, and the promotion of world peace.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I submit a written notice of a proposed amendment to the rules.

Mr. BACON. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that during the session of the next legislative day of the Senate, or a later day, I shall offer an amendment to Rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate to the following effect:

(1) Change the paragraph which now reads "A Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, to consist of five Senators," so as to read "A Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, to consist of five Senators."

(2) Insert after the paragraph which reads "A Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to consist of five Senators," a new paragraph, to read as follows: "A Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor, to consist of five Senators."

(3) Insert after the paragraph which reads "A Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to consist of five Senators," a new paragraph, to read as follows: "A Committee on Roads, to consist of 17 Senators."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

REGULATION OF WATERWAYS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that 2,000 copies be printed of Senate bill 2739, the river regulation bill, which I introduced yesterday. The committee itself would have the power ordinarily to authorize the printing of 1,000 copies, but owing to the objection of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and his contention that it should go to the Committee on Commerce the question of reference is now pending with the bill on the table. I ask unanimous consent that 2,000 copies of the bill be printed, as there is a very great demand for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is the bill for river regulation. The Senator is familiar with the bill, which I have been offering for some time, and which I yesterday introduced again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that the bill in which reservoirs and levees and everything else are included?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It includes the whole question of river regulation from source to mouth and of tributaries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Everything is proportionately harmonized?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How many copies does the Senator wish to have printed?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Two thousand copies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not state whether he wants them for the use of his committee or for the use of the Senate. I think he ought to state in the request that they are for the use of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask that 500 copies be printed for the use of the committee and the remainder for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BURTON. I do not understand that any request is made as to the reference of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTON. It is merely as to printing a number of copies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is all.

The order as agreed to is as follows:

Ordered, That 2,000 additional copies of S. 2739 be printed, 1,500 for use of the Senate and 500 for use of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its chief clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2517) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN RAILWAY COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House to Senate bill 2517.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2517) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, which were read, as follows:

Page 10, strike out lines 4 to 22, inclusive, and insert:

"The board of arbitration shall furnish a certified copy of its award to the respective parties to the controversy, and shall transmit the original, together with the papers and proceedings and a transcript of the testimony taken at the hearings, certified under the hands of the arbitrators, to the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district wherein the controversy arose or the arbitration is entered into, to be filed in said clerk's office as provided in paragraph 11 of section 4 of this act. And said board shall also furnish a certified copy of its award, and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony relating thereto, to the board of mediation and conciliation, to be filed in its office.

"The United States Commerce Court, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics are hereby authorized to turn over to the board of mediation and conciliation upon its request any papers and documents heretofore filed with them and bearing upon mediation or arbitration proceedings held under the provisions of the act approved June 1, 1898, providing for mediation and arbitration."

Page 11, after line 26, insert:

"Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require an employee to render personal service without his consent, and no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any employee against his will of a contract for personal labor or service."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the request for unanimous consent, but I presume the Senator from Nevada will discuss the changes before the amendments are voted upon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. Do I understand that unanimous consent has been given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No objection has been made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state to the Senate that Senate bill 2517, which passed the Senate some days since, represented the views of the railway employees and of the railway carriers, assisted by Mr. Justice Knapp, of the Commerce Court, Mr. Neill, former Commissioner of Labor, and the committee appointed by the Civic Federation. That bill passed the Senate without amendment. In the House certain amendments were presented to the bill, among them two amendments which were to-day adopted. Other amendments became the source of contention between the parties interested.

The bill as it passed the Senate made the bureau of mediation an independent bureau, its members being appointed by the President of the United States, and not connected with any department. The original Erdman Act made the Commissioner of Labor ex officio a member of the board of mediation, but at that time the Bureau of Labor was an independent bureau, not connected with any department, and as independent in its operations as the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. Later on the Bureau of Labor was attached to the Department of Commerce, and later on it was transferred to the newly organized Department of Labor. Thus by operation of law the Bureau of Labor has lost its independent character and has become attached to a political department.

The railway employees and employers were of the opinion that the bureau of mediation contemplated by this legislation should be an independent bureau, as was the mediation board under the original Erdman Act. The Secretary of Labor, however, was of the opinion that to make this bureau of mediation an independent bureau was to interfere very materially with the jurisdiction and the usefulness of the newly organized Department of Labor. The House Committee on the Judiciary shared in that view and adopted an amendment making the bureau of mediation practically a part of the Department of Labor by making the Commissioner of Labor Statistics one of its members.

As a result of this difference of view a conference was held at the White House yesterday, at which Mr. Secretary Wilson was present and at which were also present the committee representing the brotherhoods; the committee of railway presidents; the representatives of the Civic Federation, headed by Mr. Seth Low; Mr. CLAYTON, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House; Mr. MANN, minority leader of the House; and myself, as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. Unfortunately, we lacked the presence, owing to his absence from the city, of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the leader of the minority in this body.

At that conference these matters of disagreement were fully discussed, and while Secretary Wilson, actuated doubtless by a desire to make his department highly efficient and useful, was desirous that its jurisdiction should not be impaired, he announced his willingness to accede to the sentiment of the majority there present. The result was that there was practically a unanimous expression of view that the independent character of the bureau of mediation should be maintained, but that two amendments, not material to this contention, which had been offered in the House of Representatives, should be added to the bill. Those amendments are now before the Senate for its action.

The first amendment provides simply for the filing of the award of arbitration, and is, in my judgment, an improvement upon the provision contained in the Senate bill, and is intended to perfect the operation of the Senate bill in that particular. It might be well for me to read the first amendment:

The board of arbitration shall furnish a certified copy of its award to the respective parties to the controversy, and shall transmit the original, together with the papers and proceedings and a transcript of the testimony taken at the hearings, certified under the hands of the arbitrators, to the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district wherein the controversy arose or the arbitration is entered into, to be filed in said clerk's office as provided in paragraph 11 of section 4 of this act. And said board shall also furnish a certified copy of its award, and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony relating thereto, to the board of mediation and conciliation, to be filed in its office.

The United States Commerce Court, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics are hereby authorized to turn over to the board of mediation and conciliation upon its request any papers and documents heretofore filed with them and bearing upon mediation or arbitration proceedings held under the provisions of the act approved June 1, 1898, providing for mediation and arbitration.

The second amendment is as follows:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require an employee to render personal service without his consent, and no injunction or other legal process shall be issued which shall compel the performance by any employee against his will of a contract for personal labor or service.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What is the effect of the last amendment which the Senator has read upon the bill as a whole? What strength would there be to an arbitration under this law; by what means could it be carried into effect, if the parties should see fit to ignore it? In other words, what verity and binding force would the judgment of arbitration have? I am asking the Senator's view because he has given particular attention to the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am not prepared to state what effect would be given to the award of the arbitrators if the parties chose to ignore it.

I will only state as to this amendment that by inadvertence it was left out of the bill. This amendment was a substantial part of the Erdman Act as it originally passed. The attention of all present at the conference yesterday was called to this by one of the Members of the House of Representatives, and both the representatives of the railroads and the representatives of the employees stated that there was no objection whatever to its insertion; that it was left out by inadvertence.

Now, I prefer not to enter into a discussion as to what legal effect can be given to the award of the board of arbitration. The sentiment of the Senate committee has been—and its expression was unanimous—that the effort made by the representatives of the carriers and their employees to bring about mediation and conciliation, and if that failed to bring about arbitration between the parties, was a most commendable effort, and that whatever they agreed upon not in conflict with public policy should be approved and given effect by legislation. That has been the spirit of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I believe the spirit of the Senate in the adoption of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am in harmony with the spirit which the Senator says prevailed in the committee, and I am in harmony with the object to be attained. I realize that in all probability this bill ought to pass, and pass with some degree of dispatch, in order to meet the present situation. But I was anxious to know, in view of the fact that it will be upon the statute books after this crisis is over, what binding effect an arbitration under this law would have upon the parties.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would prefer not to enter upon that discussion. It abounds in difficulties, and it will be largely a matter of prediction in which I prefer not to indulge. All I can say is that this act is, in my judgment, highly commendable legislation, because it is the encouragement of an effort upon the part of the parties engaged in a great industry, employing thousands of people, to substitute by agreement among themselves, ratified by legislation, industrial peace for industrial war. Even if their method was, in my judgment, a defective one, I would rather validate it through legislation than attempt to perfect it against their will.

There has been the greatest difficulty heretofore in bringing the parties to these great industrial controversies into communication with each other, and I think the representatives of these great organizations are to be congratulated upon the success which they have achieved, upon the admirable ability which they have shown in their negotiations, and upon the general spirit of conciliation which is manifest between the two sides of a great industry. It is my hope, and I think this bill furnishes reason for the hope, that this is a step in the process of evolution of industrial courts, both National and State, which upon a careful consideration of the facts, upon a careful study of the economic side of every question presented to them, will determine the controversies between capital and labor, which, with the advance of civilization, have become more and more of a disturbing element among us, practically paralyzing the commerce of the country.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendments of the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that the proper proceeding, if the Senator from Nevada wants concurrence, is to move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate concur in the two amendments of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives?

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CUMMINS. That covers both amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted the following order, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That 2,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 2517) entitled "An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees," as agreed to by both Houses, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to give notice that on Thursday the 24th, immediately after the completion of the routine business, I will submit some remarks on the subject of the tariff on California products.

THE TARIFF—PANIC OF 1893.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, prophecy is the dominant note in all debate against tariff revision. The people are admonished to bear the ills they justly complain of, lest change may substitute graver ones in their stead. Forecasts are fashioned from the framework of previous disasters, whose origin is cunningly shaped into a semblance of so-called free-trade legislation. A chorus of warning chanted by the press and on the platform, designed to secure to privilege all it has acquired, begets a dread of certain disaster. Apprehension thus aroused, easily imagines the presence of what it is taught to fear, and the currents of trade become less active. These are called the shadows of coming events, the prelude to closing factories, to stagnant commerce, and arrested development of the country. It is urged that if the mere prospect of tariff revision is so pernicious, its actual accomplishment must paralyze industry; that such has been its inevitable consequence in the past, and that panic and disaster have been the bitter fruit of all disturbances of the protective system.

These tactics of obstruction are not peculiar to the progress of reform in taxation. They are employed to defeat or attenuate all schemes of legislative reform. For man is influenced in his progress through the world far less by reason than by imagination. Prejudice and fear shackle the limbs and retard the march of the race toward the goal of its ultimate destiny. They are perhaps essential elements in the determination of all social and political problems; but conservatism and privilege never fail to raise them as barriers against the laws of development and the march of history. Many times they ignore or falsify the latter, that they may obstruct or defeat the just demands of the people for changes in their economic or political systems.

In keeping with this course it has recently been asserted, both in this Chamber and out of it, that the Wilson tariff law of August, 1894, and the presage of its enactment, caused the fateful panic of 1893, and that the Underwood bill is charged with similar elements of danger to the well-being of the country. It has been intimated also that other periods of industrial depression had been influenced by the fear or the fact of tariff revision, and that commercial disasters are inseparable from a general reduction of tariff duties; that conditions now prevailing in the general field of trade and commerce are alarming and must become worse as the menace of tariff revision continues; and that the enactment of the Underwood bill into law will be a congressional sentence of death to business prosperity. As the time approaches for final action upon the measure, these gloomy forebodings are indulged with greater frequency, and legislators are impressed by solemn exhortations of the press and of the forum with the tremendous responsibilities resting upon them and the grave consequences awaiting their disregard of the public warnings. We must not disturb abuses hoary with age and without defenders, for bad as they are, no remedy can be applied without shaking the fabric of the commercial world to its foundations. We are admonished that the schedules of the Wilson bill, modifying the then existing rates of duty never so little, and enacted after its scandalous career through the Senate, toppled business into a heap of ruins, from which the people slowly emerged through a long travail of misery and finally recovered their former status through the healing and ever blessed agency of the Dingley tariff law.

Mr. President, the Wilson law of 1894 was the most miserable pretense of tariff reform ever placed upon our statute books. It was eviscerated by the Senate, agreed to by the House only because its long and disgraceful sojourn through the upper Chamber had disgusted the people with the very thought of tariff reform, and repudiated by the President as a thing fraught with party perfidy and national dishonor. But wretched as it was, it can plead not guilty to the charge of bringing disaster to the country. And while every man at all familiar with the history of that time knows this to be true, I propose if I can to put the responsibility for that terrible calamity where it properly belongs, to the end that its ghost may not be again resurrected to threaten our purpose or vex our deliberations. Fortunately for me, at least, this is a task of no serious dimensions. For I am fain to believe that the panic of 1893 is in a class of its own, without parallel and without precedent, both as to its origin and its object.

Mr. President, the year 1892 was a prosperous and happy one. The people had indulged in much speculation, and the mass of public and private debt swelled to undue proportions. But business was good and the crops were abundant. In the parlance of the street, money was easy. In their yearly review for 1892, Dun & Co. declared that the year "started with the largest trade ever known—the mills crowded with work and all business stimulated with high hopes." And this review, be it remembered, was published but two months after a presidential election, in which tariff reform had been the issue, ostensibly at least, and that issue had won.

The New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle in its review of the year 1892, published in January, 1893, said:

> The year 1892 was singularly free from great and unexpected disasters in the manufacturing, mercantile, and banking community.

On January 16, 1893, the New York Tribune contained an article with this caption:

> Few failures in 1892—Proofs of a prosperity rarely surpassed.

It declared that—

> Among the evidences that the year 1892 was one of the most prosperous in the history of the country, the record of failures is of peculiar interest. For 10 years there never has been so few failures compared with the number of firms in business in any other year as in 1892. In 23 years the average of defaulted liabilities to the whole number of firms in business has never been so small as it was in 1892, except 12 years ago in the exceptionally prosperous year 1880. Only in that year and the next was the average of defaulted liabilities to the exchanges through all the clearing houses as low as it was in 1892.

And on April 19 it commented favorably on the report of the New York superintendent of banking, which showed an increase in deposits of 1892 over 1891 of nearly $41,000,000. Mr. Cleveland, in his message to Congress of August 7, 1893, one year before the passage of the Wilson bill, said:

> Our unfortunate plight is not the result of untoward events nor of conditions related to our natural resources; nor is it traceable to any of the afflictions which frequently check natural growth and prosperity. With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear has sprung up on every side.

And Mr. McKinley, on July 11, 1896, from the porch of his house in Canton, said:

> We have now the same currency that we had in 1892, good the world over and unquestioned by any people. And then, too, we had unexampled credit and prosperity.

This credit and prosperity, unexampled in their character, existed concurrently with an act of Congress of 1890, known as the Sherman silver law, having for its ostensible purpose the maintenance of the parity between gold and silver, and providing for the monthly purchase by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, against which were issued certificates redeemable in coin. It is needless now to describe the bill in detail, nor the construction placed upon it by the Treasury Department, nor the thwarting of its provisions by the methods of its administration. It was enacted over the bitter opposition and at all times encountered the undisguised hostility of the banking world, which then as now sought to obtain and enjoy the power to control and regulate the volume of currency circulation, with which that law was wholly incompatible.

These interests fought the measure from its inception to its repeal. It was a compromise statute which never should have been enacted, but for reasons wholly different from those advanced against it by its enemies. It was not the product of the bimetallists who believed in free coinage; with which principle the law was in hopeless conflict. Yet I deliberately affirm that this country in all its history never enjoyed a greater period of expansive growth and prosperity than during the interval between the enactment of this law and the panic of 1893. But the bankers of the East had resolved upon its destruction. In a speech from the steps of the New York subtreasury in 1891, Mr. Cleveland pronounced against it. From that moment he became their candidate for the Presidency. They made his campaign for him, forced his nomination upon a reluctant party, with tariff revision as the nominal issue of his platform. He was elected with a Democratic majority of both Houses of Congress. Then the real purpose which the Democracy had been chosen by these interests to accomplish was revealed.

The great majority of the leadership and the rank and file of that party believed in the gold and silver money of the Constitution. They did not approve the Sherman law, but desired to retain it as a hostage for free coinage. They had no thought of its unconditional repeal. But the enemies of the measure had other views and determined to make them effective in advance of the inauguration of the President elect, who lent them his hearty and active cooperation.

The result of the election had scarcely been announced when the banks, through the eastern press, set up a demand for "the immediate unconditional repeal of the silver law." This clamor swelled in fierceness and in volume as the meeting of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress approached. Every other subject of political importance was practically excluded from public consideration. The repeal was opposed as a matter of course by the southern and western people, and by the sounder judgment of the masses everywhere.

Congress convened on December 6, from which time the hitherto alleged robberies of the McKinley bill on the one side and peril to industry involved in its repeal upon the other were forgotten by eastern high-tariff Republicans and low-tariff Democrats, who joined in contending that the first political duty of the hour was obedience to the pressing demands of Wall Street. Bills for the repeal of the silver law were therefore promptly introduced in both Houses. But the advocates for repeal, although clamorous for immediate action, soon discovered that they had again mistaken the sentiment of the Nation. Republicans like John Sherman and Democrats like William F. Vilas might applaud their doctrines and aid their plans, but the great body of the South and West was sound. Representatives and Senators from these sections, with an exception here and there, confronted repeal with a vigorous and determined resistance which nothing could overcome.

The President elect was surprised and displeased by this unexpected revolt against his plan of "currency reform." He resolved to make repeal of the Sherman Act the test of fidelity to his coming administration, and Democratic Senators and Representatives not complying with his wishes could expect no favors at his hands. It was significant of this spirit that the New York Herald and Times on the same day editorially declared that Democratic Congressmen opposing repeal must go into retirement. But they remained obdurate.

About this time and on January 12, 1893, Mr. Henry Villard, a New York financier of note, appeared in Washington as the agent of Mr. Cleveland. His mission was to break the force of Democratic opposition to the repeal bill, and to utilize the prestige of the incoming administration for that purpose. His methods were neither pleasing nor politic. He gave offense to many with whom he came in contact, but succeeded in securing the promise of 12 Democratic Senators to vote for repeal. He was in Washington five days. He was perniciously active and industrious while here, even conferring with the Speaker and the House Committee on Rules, with a view of restricting debate upon the bill. But he returned to New York with an empty game bag.

Two weeks later Mr. Cleveland sent a second envoy to the Capital. This time he selected Don M. Dickinson, his former Postmaster General, to be his emissary. The advent of Mr. Dickinson at the Capital was announced with much impressiveness. A Washington dispatch to the New York Herald of February 1 informed the country that—

> Don Manuel Dickinson came to the city last night and has spent the day in consultation with the Democratic leaders. The repeal of the silver law has never before received such an agitation. The word has gone out among Democrats that this act must be repealed at this session. Mr. Cleveland has it in his power to make matters very uncomfortable for certain silver Democrats. The question of the patronage will be an important one after March 4. The scare is pretty general. There is no doubt that this second expression of President-elect Cleveland will bear fruit. He gave his first intimation when Mr. Henry Villard came to the city and consulted with the Democratic Members of Congress. The second can not be misunderstood.

And the Herald announced in its editorial of the same day that—> as a party man, as an upholder of the regular organization, as a vindicator of the machine, Mr. Cleveland will stand on firm ground when he declares that every aspirant for office, patronage, favor, or any consideration will be expected to line up for the repeal of the silver law.

No public man can be justly charged with responsibility for newspaper comment or criticism. If that were so, the burden of his responsibilities would be great indeed. But there are times, and this was one of them, when action and announcement synchronize with wonderful accuracy; when the thing to be done and the necessities of the situation require the employment of all available means and resources for the doing of it; when the difficulties and obstacles confronting the task demand heroic treatment. A first assault upon the law had been unsuccessful; the second one required the support of all the reserves or the failure would be repeated. To overcome the stubborn resisance of the silver sentiment in Congress, Mr. Dickinson was doubtless authorized to use the power of patronage to the utmost. The Herald announcements were therefore unchallenged, because they were true.

But Mr. Dickinson's task was as hopeless as that of his predecessor. The patronage scheme was a complete and contemptible failure. Few Democrats were base enough to yield to it. The great body of its representatives, sustained by a small but stalwart band of Republicans, successfully defied one of the most infamous attempts to promote legislation by corrupt influences which tarnish the records of the American Congress. On February 6 the Senate, and on February 9 the House, by decisive votes refused to consider the repeal bills. This result was as exasperating as it was unexpected. Mr. Cleveland and his confederates discovered that Democracy was not pliant to a policy at variance with party principle nor disposed to destroy 50 per cent of the people's money at the behest of any influence whatever. But the conspirators had no thought of retreating. On the contrary, their determination was intensified by their defeat.

Mr. Cleveland would become President on March 4, and new and more effective methods could then be utilized. The new Congress, like the old one, was doubtless invulnerable to direct assault, but its hand might be forced by a widespread and insistent public demand. To secure this a war upon prosperity was planned and afterwards executed, with the acquiescence, if not the approval, of the President of the United States.

Some days ago I read upon this floor a circular purporting to be dated March 12, 1893, and related to this subject, whose authenticity has been vigorously repudiated by the American Bankers' Association.

Responding to a Senator's inquiry, I said that I believed it emanated from some responsible source. My belief has since been fortified by the voluntary testimony of others, and by the fact that it harmonizes with the swiftly succeeding events of that memorable year. But I am not compelled to rely upon that document to sustain my assertion that the disasters of 1893 were directly caused by the determination of the banking interests and of the administration to force the speedy repeal of an obnoxious law. I may concede that it was spurious, or that it was an ex post facto forgery. I may discard it utterly and easily maintain the proposition.

Although Mr. Cleveland, shortly after his reelection, authorized Hon. William M. Springer to announce that none holding office under his first administration would be reappointed; he excepted Mr. Conrad N. Jordan from the rule shortly after his second term began. That gentleman had been United States Treasurer from June 1885 to May 1887. On April 11, 1893, Mr. Jordan was appointed, and on April 14 he was confirmed as subtreasurer at New York. The reasons for his appointment to this important post soon became apparent. He was chosen to become the medium between the administration and the bankers of New York in arranging the details of a crusade against the Sherman silver law.

Mr. Jordan went to Washington on Thursday the 20th and filed his bonds, returning to New York on Friday the 21st. While in Washington he was in conference with Mr. Cleveland, and on his arrival in New York late in the afternoon, he went directly to the Chase National Bank, where he was awaited by its president, Mr. Henry W. Cannon, and Mr. J. Edward Simmons, president of the Fourth National Bank.

What happened at that meeting may be inferred from swiftly following events. Mr. Cannon took the midnight train for Washington, reporting the next morning at the White House. He remained in Washington until Sunday afternoon the 23d.

Meanwhile and on Saturday morning the 22d, Mr. Jordan took possession of the subtreasury, and then proceeded to arrange a meeting of bankers for that afternoon at the clearing house. It was said to have been informal, and was attended by Presidents Wright, of the Park National; Williams, of the Chemical National; Perkins, of the Importers and Traders' National; Baker, of the First National; Woodward, of the Hanover National; and Nash, of the Corn Exchange.

From this meeting Mr. Jordan went to Washington on a late evening train, reported at the White House with Mr. Cannon on Sunday morning, where a long conference was held with Mr. Cleveland; after which Mr. Jordan accompanied Mr. Cannon back to New York. Before leaving, Mr. Jordan wired certain bank presidents to meet him at a designated house uptown on his arrival. They did so. It is reasonable to conclude that the meeting was an urgent one and the direct outgrowth of the Sunday conference with Mr. Cleveland at Washington.

On Monday morning, the 24th, Mr. Jordan requested the officers of the banks, trust companies, and representatives of foreign banking houses in New York to meet him at once at the subtreasury. They promptly responded. It was a very important conference. Public interest was keenly alert as to its purposes, the press having kept it informed of preceding events. But its deliberations were carefully guarded. Mr. Jordan not only refused to divulge any information, but denied that any conference was being held. The daily press attempted, without success, to obtain information of its doings. The Post said:

> Conrad N. Jordan took charge of the Subtreasury this morning as assistant treasurer. To a reporter of the Evening Post he declared that he had nothing to say; that he had no conferences with anyone or anybody, and knew of none. At that time J. Edward Simmons, of the Fourth National, Henry W. Cannon, of the Chase, Brayton Ives, of the Western, and Charles J. Canda, ex-assistant treasurer, were in Mr. Jordan's private room. They were in consultation with Mr. Jordan for some hours. During that time George I. Coe, of the American Exchange National, called and saw Mr. Jordan twice. Mr. Jordan and the bank officers were still in conference at 12 o'clock. Mr. Fairchild joined them a little before noon. Mr. Jordan's conferences with the bank officers named continued, so far as those waiting on the outside could tell, until 1 o'clock. Then the bank presidents arrived and were at once ushered into Mr. Jordan's office. Among these were E. K. Wright, James Stillman, and E. H. Perkins, jr.

The Sun of the 25th gave practically the same account, but added that Mr. Jordan's conferences were "the result of his talk with President Cleveland."

The Times of the 25th said that—> from the time Wall Street began business yesterday morning until long after most of the offices were locked up for the day Conrad N. Jordan, the assistant subtreasurer of the United States in this city, was in conference with bankers. There were meetings morning, afternoon, and by gaslight.

Said the Herald:

> An all-day secret session of bankers and trust company officials at the Subtreasury did not relieve the apprehensions of the Street. Although the meeting formally closed about 3 o'clock, other bankers came in, and some returned who had been called away. In this way Mr. Jordan was closeted all day with financial magnates. "What was it all about?" asked anxious Wall Street. There were only evasive replies from those who had been at the meeting. They said they had been pledged to secrecy.

One thing determined on soon became apparent. This was a conference with the Secretary of the Treasury. For Mr. Carlisle wrote Mr. Jordan on April 26 that he would reach New York the next evening and would meet the New York bankers at their convenience. He arrived according to program, and at half past 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 27th was driven to the residence of Mr. George G. Williams, of the Chemical National Bank, where he was welcomed by Mr. Jordan and by Presidents Perkins, Tappan, Woodward, Ives, Cannon, Coe, Sherman, and Simmons. We are told that the meeting was marked by the most cordial spirit on the part of the Secretary and the bankers. That the latter recognized the difficulties of Mr. Carlisle's position and the former thanked the bankers for their expressions of sympathy. Then they proceeded to get down to the business that called them together, which was to make a practical demonstration to the business men of the South and the West of the injurious effects of the Sherman law upon their trade and finances, that being necessary to convert the fanatics of those sections to vote for a repeal. This seemed desirable on all sides, and while the administration would not aggravate the situation, it would do nothing to prevent or assuage it.

It is not probable that the purpose of the meeting or the policy of the administration was discussed with such brutal frankness. But that was not necessary. Mr. Jordan had arranged the preliminaries. Mr. Carlisle approved them. The stage settings then became complete; the time had come for the curtain to rise that the drama might be enacted. The object lesson had been prepared; it only remained to administer it.

It may seem incredible that the Secretary of the Treasury should have given his sanction to a raid upon the commerce and industry of the country, but the fact is so. The meetings and consultations I have narrated concerned that subject and arranged its details. On April 28, 1893, the New York Sun said:

> President Cleveland's advisers have told him that the only way to induce the western Senators and Congressmen to consent to a repeal of the silver law is to demonstrate to their constituents that they are losing money every day that this law is in operation. Missionary work in that direction has been started by a number of the bankers in the East—and the Chicago bankers, it was said, have been carrying out the same line of policy.

On April 29 the Tribune, referring to the bank presidents' conference, said that its results—> confirm the intimations that have been given that Mr. Cleveland looks to the strengthening of a sound-money sentiment through a practical demonstration to business men at the West and South of the injurious operation of the silver law on trade and finance.

Same day:

> A prominent man well versed in financial questions, who came from Washington on Wednesday (April 26), said yesterday that while the administration would exert all its powers to defend the integrity of the Government, it had decided that an object lesson which would help the cause of financial reform might best be found in the distress which the monetary stringency may cause.

That prominent man could have been none other than the Secretary of the Treasury.

A Sun dispatch from Washington, April 29, said:

The subjugation of Congress to the views and purposes of the administration is the determination of Mr. Cleveland uttered through Secretary Carlisle to the New York bankers. The statement of Mr. Carlisle to the bankers makes it clear that while Cleveland works in Congress, the bankers will be expected to work not in New York only, but throughout the country—doing their utmost to pinch business everywhere, in the expectation of causing a money crisis that will affect Congress powerfully from every quarter.

After the Carlisle conference on the 27th the campaign of disaster began. Its progress was chronicled in all the daily papers, but I will let the Tribune tell the story.

On Sunday, May 1, it said that the week ending with April 29 had displayed remarkable strength and courage, but the upward movement in prices culminated at the opening on Friday morning and for the last two days it was reversed. On Monday, the 2d, it said that the increasing difficulty of borrowing money of the New York banks was an unfavorable feature of the exchange.

On Tuesday it said the stock market continued to decline. On Wednesday it reported the market as active and in some cases materially lower, but at no time panicky. On Thursday it said:

This was a day of enforced liquidation at the stock exchange, and where the security was not ample several banks did not hesitate to put the collateral on the market.

On Friday, the 5th, it said:

Events are moving rapidly in Wall Street. President Cleveland and Secretary Carlisle are comfortable and confident, Washington dispatches state, but the stock and other markets are not. The administration thinks the Treasury is in no danger, and if some people suffer, it is hoped that their suffering may dispose their minds to the President's wishes. Apparently he counts upon severe pressure in finances and business to change the hearts of the silver men.

On Friday, the 5th, the storm broke in full. The Tribune accounts of its havoc filled four and a half of its columns.

This—

was a day of terrible strain. The stock exchange trembled. The significance of its situation lay in its threatening character, which menaced at one time a panic that, if it had escaped control, would have produced disastrous consequences impossible to measure. The enormous losses of the week, the utter demoralization of the buying power of the market, and the practical paralysis of credit promised a liquidation which, unless stayed, would have swept them all off their feet.

This condition, with intermittent changes, accompanied by failures and suspensions throughout the country, continued until June 25, when Great Britain announced the closure of the Indian mints against the further coinage of silver. That this monstrous outrage against millions of dependent and helpless subjects of the British Government was part of the general scheme to force the hand of the American Congress by the infliction of a premeditated disaster upon the people seems incontestable, for it came at a most appropriate time, as the cunning act of a prearranged plan, requiring a special session of Congress for its final consummation. Five days afterwards the President issued his proclamation for the session.

I shall not trace the progress of the commercial calamity of 1893. Its awful consequences are too fresh in the minds of this generation to make it necessary. I shall merely advert to some of the comments of the New York papers upon its progress.

On May 22 the Tribune said editorially:

The President has reason to claim that he is succeeding if he desires to bring severe pressure upon business men. Whether the effect will be to render them more favorable to his policy is not yet clear. But there is no lack of pressure.

On May 29 the same paper said:

The West and the South are receiving the "object lesson" the present administration threatened, and it is reported that some prominent Members of Congress have been converted in regard to the pernicious effects of the Sherman law.

This paper announced the closure of the Indian mint in these headlines:

A blow at silver values—The action of India severely depresses the white metal, stimulating the repeal sentiment—The silver men dumb.

On July 28 the Evening Post said:

There is nothing like an object lesson to open the eyes of the people to the working of a principle.

And its exultation over the widespread ruin that followed in the wake of this object lesson culminated on September 21 in this announcement:

An unusually large amount of domestic paper will mature next month, and extensions are already being extensively asked for by merchants. The banks, however, are not so complacent as they were two months ago. Then, as a bank officer said this morning, it was a case of mutual assistance; the banks could not afford then to let solvent concerns fail or suspend on account of the bad effect such failures would have on the general situation. Now the situation is different. The banks are strong in cash and can afford to be more independent. Therefore the merchants who can not meet their obligations will have a harder task to get extensions or more accommodation, and their failure now would be regarded with comparative complacency, in order to clear the financial atmosphere.

The evident satisfaction with which this paper announces that the banks, though amply able to do so, will not save struggling solvent merchants from failure, but will regard the latter with complacency, is astounding. To "clear the financial atmosphere"—that is, to force a repeal of the silver law—bankruptcy and ruin are not only permitted but welcomed.

The heartlessness, the callous indifference of confederated wealth to such conditions is appalling. And the policy was finally successful. After a long heartrending struggle the Senate yielded, the battle ended, and in October, 1893, the silver law was repealed. The New York bankers, their hands red with the blood of slaughtered prosperity, bore their trophy from the field. To win it they plunged their country into an abyss of misery, strewed ruin and bankruptcy throughout the land, destroyed values by the hundreds of millions, and beggared countless thousands of their countrymen.

They were able to do this by the utilization of two distinct but closely related agencies. One of them was the widely extended credit of that period. A preceding season of good times had stimulated the building of railroads and the pursuit of many enterprises financed by bond issues and bank discounts. A tremendous amount of commercial paper was held by money lenders, and municipal and public-utility improvements had made large demands upon the money volume. By refusing further credit, calling loans, and rejecting discounts, confidence could be easily exchanged for fear. Money stringency would follow swift upon the heels of demand, and those controlling the funds could dictate to men whose needs were overpowering. This policy was remorselessly pursued, and with but few, if any, exceptions.

And here I may say that nearly all the financial panics of history have their genesis in the accumulation of debt. Men borrow in times of ease, when the prospect is cloudless and prosperity beckons to adventure. Money is then easily obtainable and the land is busy with countless and diversified activities. But the day comes when the mass of obligation is too unwieldy for the existing civilization to support it. A large and unexpected default somewhere first startles, then starts the avalanche, and panic is upon us. It may be accelerated as it may be retarded or avoided by those who are familiar with conditions and possess the power to influence them. In 1893 we were approaching but had by no means reached the limit of the country's power to carry its public and private burdens. Prudence doubtless would have suggested a policy of retrenchment, but general bankruptcy was beyond the horizon. But credit had been used in ample measure for the architects of the proposed object lesson to make their scheme effective.

The second agency was the New York Stock Exchange, the Monte Carlo of American finance, the most prodigious gambling hell of this or any preceding age. Under our system of corporate organization, whereby all the trades and pursuits of man are capitalized and embodied in the issue of stocks and bonds, it manipulates and levies tribute upon them all. Shares and securities, representing trade, transportation, production, and manufacture, are the pawns and counters of its games and combinations. It plays with loaded dice, deals marked cards, and uses all the devices of cunning and deceit. It is the swindlers' paradise. It is a huge vampire, that sucks the blood from the arteries of industry. It is an unincorporated, irresponsible monstrosity. It is beyond the pale of the law. Its votaries pay it homage without transgressing any commandment, for there is nothing like it in heaven, on earth, or in the waters under the earth. It is the antithesis of fair dealing and common honesty. It has sanctified speculation, made men discontented with the slow and safe processes of accumulation, and created a mad and universal desire for wealth without toil and struggle. It is the most pernicious and corroding influence in the land. But it is nevertheless the most potent of all instruments for the transfer of property from the possession of the many into the hands of the few. Even so it operates by the connivance of the great metropolitan reserve banks, through whose channels it utilizes the money of the land.

This constitutes its chief support, without which it would collapse of its own weight. Sustained by this mighty financial influence, its hold upon the Nation's commerce has no limitations. Its finger is ever upon the country's pulse, controlling its financial course and dictating its industrial policy. The money power feeds it funds or starves it by withholding them, as their plans or ambitions suggest. It is their facile instrument for the accomplishment of ulterior ends. By its agency they help or hinder the Nation's progress, fix the prices of securities, and juggle with all the schemes and pursuits of man. No power save that of the Nation can stay the progress of this juggernaut or arrest the hand that guides it.

The cooperation of this institution with that of the banks at this juncture was therefore inevitable. The national administration alone could have stood in the way, but it became an accessory before the fact to the commercial crime of the century. It applauded the actors as the tragedy proceeded. Without its connivance the plan would have miscarried. It would not have been projected. For the first and, I sincerely pray, the only time in our history the people's Government became the open ally of a powerful private interest for their own undoing. It remained passive as the plot unfolded, it became active as action was desired. Congress fought as long as endurance permitted, but it could not overcome the union of money with the national administration. The special session adjourned late in October. It had expunged the silver law from the statute books and business was prostrate from ocean to ocean.

Shortly afterwards, and on November 3, the Tribune said that—

The President in explaining his refusal to call an extra session of Congress last spring showed by his remarks on the subject that he clearly anticipated serious reverses during the summer. He stated that he proposed to let the country have an object lesson and learn by experience what the silver law was doing.

But he knew, and the country also, that such was not the lesson that he taught. The bitter lesson learned was the extent to which the financial and political enemies of that law would go in order to encompass its repeal.

On November 27, 1893, the Tribune gave a graphic picture of the effects of the panic. It said that it had caused—a financial disturbance and widespread business depression that cost thousands of millions in depreciated values, administered a blow to public and private credit from which it would take years to recover, and carried hardship and privation and distress into thousands of homes all over the land.

And added that—

President Cleveland exhibited a clear knowledge when he said last spring that just such a lesson was needed and that without it nothing could be done in the direction of repeal.

Other facts connected with the causes of this panic are abundant; but I need not recall them. There can be no denial of the origin and purpose of this frightful calamity. Mr. Cleveland and the New York banks conspired to wreck the progress and prosperity of the Nation that they might be rid of an unwelcome law. The sinister power of money in combination was never more signally demonstrated. The Money Trust existed then as it has existed since. It swept silver money from its pathway then as it conspires to wrest the power of note issue from the Government now; but with this fundamental difference—it controlled the Government then but does not control it now.

The Wilson bill was not framed until after all these things had transpired. It was introduced in the House at the regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, which convened on the first Monday in December. It did not become a law until August of the following year. It succeeded the McKinley tariff, which was meanwhile in unrestricted operation. If the tariff had anything to do with the tragedy of 1893, it was the McKinley and not the Wilson tariff.

It is true that the effects of the panic extended through and far beyond the enactment of the last-mentioned law, but this would have been so had it never been enacted. And if the disaster whose coming is now so freely predicted shall overtake us in the near future, it will be caused not by the enactment of the pending revision bill, but by the same influences which produced it before. I do not say they will do it. I do not think they will do it. They have no partnership with the administration. That has been dissolved by the people. They will have no cooperation there. The temper of the people has changed. They can not be fooled all the time. They will hereafter fix the responsibility for commercial disturbances where it belongs. Their ability and disposition to do so is most apparent. They have recoverpd possession of their Government, they will restore its legitimate functions to the end that all may enjoy its benefits as all must share its burdens.

I know that this determination is not relished by those who have so long used the influence of the Government to the furthering of their own fortunes, and that every effort will be made to thwart it. I know that their resources are as powerful as their scruples are weak; that privilege never surrenders until it has been entirely overcome. And yet I do not fear the consequences of our transition from the extravagances of prohibitive protection to the equities of a tariff for revenue. I may be a dreamer, as I have been charged with being, but I am convinced that a sober second thought is even now staying the spirit that would set in motion the forces of financial disaster. The demand for revenue reform has been insistent for years. It has recently asserted itself at the polls. Its representatives have been invested with authority and its accomplishment is at hand. The good sense, the courage, and the optimism of our countrymen in all the walks of life, and above all their ready acquiescence in the verdict of the majority will pilot the Nation safely through all dangers that may beset its course.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, on the 15th of August, 1911, a matter which bears upon the very able speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was adverted to in this Chamber. I send now to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the remarks of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on that occasion, which I think are pertinent to the matter in hand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a most pathetic appeal to the Senate not to pass the proposed reductions in the duties of Schedule K, lest we bring on again business depression and disaster such as visited us in 1893. And he charged the dire effects of that period against the Wilson tariff law. I never have believed the Wilson tariff law was the cause of the financial troubles of that time. Those troubles began before the enactment of the Wilson tariff law. It was a period of general business depression. It began abroad in 1890 and swept over the whole world. It culminated in the panic of 1893. It is puerile to attribute it to the Wilson tariff law of 1894. I know the claims that have been made by many Republican newspapers and campaign orators, and I know how labor has been appealed to, and, as election approaches, how it has been driven to the support of the standpat policies and candidates out of the fears that have been played upon in the heat and fever of the campaign, threatening a repetition of those heartbreaking times if the sacred tariff rates of the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich laws were even threatened with revision.

I hope, Mr. President, that the voters of this country are becoming enlightened enough to know that those appeals are without any substantial economic basis. There were other amply sufficient reasons to account for all of the depression and financial distress that swept over this country at that period of time. I do not know whether we have recovered more rapidly following the panic of 1907 than we did the panic of 1893, because the financial troubles of 1893 were world-wide. The panic of 1907 was confined to this country, and it came upon us without any justification, financially or economically. There were no industrial disturbances. It had no relation to tariff legislation any more than the panic of 1893 was related to the Wilson tariff law, which was enacted in 1894.

Mr. President, I have differences with gentlemen upon the other side. Those differences rest upon certain principles. I am willing to fight those differences to a finish with the Democratic Party, but when the Republican Party can not win upon any issue without juggling and pettifogging the case, I refuse to make that kind of a campaign.

I shall not be surprised, Mr. President, if the people of this country, whenever we revise the tariff or whenever we endeavor to pass tariff legislation, shall be treated, if not to a real panic, to something that looks like a real panic. The industrial and economic changes that have been imposed upon the people of this country in recent years have placed the control of business in the hands of a very few men. It is not difficult for those men to give this country a panic and to push them over into it at any time. So I anticipate, Mr. President, that whenever we attempt tariff revision or seek to enact legislation interfering with the trust control of business a panic will be foreshadowed, that prices will be depressed for the products of the farmer, that labor will be thrown out of employment, and that all of the threats which will serve to frighten the farmer and the wage earner will be heard on the hustings and seen on the printed page. But I shall do what I can to persuade the business men of small means and the wage earners of this country to discredit those warnings as having any logical relation to wholesome legislation.

The predictions of panic resulting from tariff reductions may come true. They can be brought to pass. They need not come true. These great industries are overprotected. Their duties could be reduced in most cases much below the point fixed in this conference report and not disturb in the slightest degree a single industry in the country. Of that I am confident. These duties will be reduced, Mr. President, if not at this session of the Congress then in the very near future; and defeat at this time, whether it be here or whether it be interposed by Executive veto, as threatened, will not long delay the lifting of these great burdens from the backs of the American people. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., 1st sess., p. 3955.)

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senate, in explanation of my bringing this matter to its attention now, that we on this side regard the senior Senator from Wisconsin as a fair fighter. He does not strike under the belt. The Senator from Colorado had dug the grave of this unfair argument against the Wilson bill, and I wanted the senior Senator from Wisconsin to erect the tombstone and be present—in spirit, at least—at the obsequies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise simply to ask one question of the Senator from West Virginia. Was the speech, an extract from which has just been read, made in favor of a bill that attached a duty of 30 per cent upon wool?

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator can recollect better than I. It was when Schedule K was under consideration in August, 1911. I am not a tariff expert. I did not take much part in that debate. I only wanted this sentiment to go before the country in connection with the speech of the Senator from Colorado and have the Senate know that it came from the Senator from Wisconsin, a Republican, but a careful, earnest man who despises an unfair argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad that the Senator from West Virginia has put into the possession of the Senate the sentiment announced by the Senator from Wisconsin, a sentiment in which I concur, but I wanted that there should accompany it the fact that the bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin provided for a duty of 35 per cent, I believe, upon wool; that the conference report, upon which probably this speech was made, although I do not know, provided for a duty of 29 per cent upon wool; and that in so far as I am concerned, and I think I speak also the view of the Senator from Wisconsin, we would be entirely satisfied at this time with a similar duty upon wool.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator a question for my information, as I was not a Member of this body at that time. Is it not a fact that the Senator from Wisconsin was then meeting the same argument of panic and disaster based upon a bill providing for a 35 per cent duty on wool that is now being made in this discussion as against the Underwood bill, which provides for no duty at all?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is just the difference between free wool and a duty of either 35 per cent or 29 per cent, according to the occasion upon which this speech was made. I think it was made upon the bill which he himself introduced.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to correct the Senator. I recall now that the duty which was fixed by Senator LA FOLLETTE's amendment was 29 per cent. At least that was the rate which he was trying to maintain in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wisconsin originally introduced a bill providing for a duty of 35 per cent, while the House passed a bill providing for a duty of 20 per cent. In collaboration with our Democratic friends upon the other side it was agreed that there should be a duty of 29 per cent, and it was upon that bill or upon his original bill that the Senator from Wisconsin made the speech to which reference is made.

I can not allow the zeal of my friends upon the other side to put those of us who were and have been for a long time in favor of a sharp reduction in duty in the attitude of favoring a complete removal of duty.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have only to say that I was not trying to put the gentlemen upon the other side in any position. I did not mention the tariff nor a rate nor anything of that kind. I simply wanted the country to know that in his deliberate moments, when he had thought upon the question, on another occasion, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], a Republican, was square enough and manly enough to put a quietus upon this argument which had been used by gentlemen upon the other side. I had no other purpose in view. I am willing for that part of the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin to speak for itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the speech which was delivered by the Senator from Wisconsin and which has just been read was made upon the conference report on the wool schedule. It shows that it was in answer to a statement that I had made in relation to that conference report.

When doctors disagree the patient is to be sympathized with. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to-day pictured the prosperity which the country was enjoying during the year 1892. That prosperity included 1890, and the Senator referred to a number of years prior to that time. The Senator from Wisconsin, in the speech just read, said that the panic was not caused by the passage of the tariff bill, because the panic had been impending for a number of years before, and the depression of business was felt not only in this country but all over the world. So one or the other statement is largely erroneous.

I say now, Mr. President, that there is no question in my mind that the passage of the so-called Wilson bill was the means of bringing to this country a great deal of the untold suffering that came to our working people following its enactment. As I said on a previous occasion, when the Senator from Colorado was discussing this question some months ago, if the conditions in the world to-day were the same as they were in 1893 there is no question in my mind but that the passage of the pending bill would bring exactly the same results as the passage of the Wilson bill brought in 1894. It was not a question of the amount of money that was in circulation at that time that brought on the panic, but it was a lack of confidence in the business future of the country from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. President, I merely wanted to say this much in answer to the statement which has just been read at the request of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had no idea of saying anything in reply to what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just said. I rise for the purpose of making a statement; but before I make the statement it perhaps would be well enough to "reminisce" a little—if that be a correct English word, and if not I originate it now. I remember very distinctly a man by the name of Gen. Weaver, from the State of Iowa, traveling over this country in 1890, 1891, and 1892, voicing all the discontent of the country, boasting in Meridian, Miss., in my presence, that he had counted his audiences in the West "not by the thousand, but by the acre," voicing the general complaint that the farmer everywhere was not getting a price commensurate with the cost of production. So far as the cotton farmer was concerned that was true; so far as the corn farmer was concerned it was true; so far as the wheat farmer was concerned it was true. Gen. Weaver laid it all to the fact that we did not have free silver coinage at 16 to 1, regardless of the will of the other nations of the world.

Mr. President, there is not in the Senate a man with a memory beyond that of a 20-year-old boy, and with average intellectual integrity, who does not confess that the great world-panic, which culminated in this country in 1893 at its most acute stage, had already begun in the balance of the world, especially in Australia and in Great Britain, with the failure of the Baring Bros., as early as 1890. The only reason why it came to the United States not earlier than 1893 was because the United States, by reason of its inexhaustible resources, its inventiveness, and many other advantages, including cheap land as the chief advantage, was able to stall it off for three years. It struck London, it struck Vienna, it struck Australia, it struck the balance of the world, rebounded around us, and reached the United States latest of all. At that time men of the school of thought of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]—although he was not a Member then of either House—but men of his school of thought were telling us that the reason for the panic was that we did not repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator from Mississippi to put me in that category, because that is not true so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said the Senator was not then in either House, but that the men of his school of political thought, the "stand-pat Republicans," with Thomas Brackett Reed at the head of them—and I was at that time in public life—were making the argument every day that the cause of the panic was that we would not speedily enough repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. There is no doubt about the fact that a general depression for two or three years preceded the acute stage of the panic of 1893. There is no doubt about the fact that after the panic in 1893 occurred conditions got worse and worse for a certain period, and then, when things got to rock-bottom and debts had been liquidated, conditions got better and better up to a certain period.

The whole history of panics is simply this, Mr. President: That undue prosperity, accompanied by undue speculation and general indebtedness, leads to panic, and that, after the panic has come, then, when humanity begins to preserve itself by getting down to a rock-bottom basis, adversity again leads to prosperity. Prosperity leads to panic and panic leads to prosperity. That is the history of the whole world from the beginning of time down to now. Whenever men get to imagining that they are so rich they need not take care of their pocketbooks they run into debt; when they run into debt too much they run into a panic; and after they have run into a panic too much they have to quit running into debt, because nobody gives them credit. Then after they quit running into debt, financial society reestablishes itself.

The Wilson bill had no more to do with the panic of 1893 than my baby boy's son's birth had to do with what took place in Judea in the times of Christ. Anybody who has any sense, coupled with any intellectual integrity, knows that.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, it took the American people a good while to find it out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, of course.

Mr. WARREN. The American people have pretty generally believed that the Wilson bill was largely responsible for the misfortunes of that period.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because there were a lot of liars going around loose in the land who coupled a great deal of intelligence with a great deal of expert information, backed by special privilege and special interests, and who were preaching the doctrine that the tariff bill which passed in September, 14 months after the panic began, was the cause of the panic that preceded it by 14 months. There never has been a day in the history of the world when an organized lie could not make an impression, and that particular organized lie made its impression, but the American people have now found out that it was a lie originated and spread by political organization.

Mr. WARREN. By what authority does the Senator say that the American people have found out that it was a lie?

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the authority of the last election, which put Woodrow Wilson in the White House.

Mr. WARREN. What will the Senator say if the next election should reverse results?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should say if the next election should reverse that result that the American people would have some good reason for it, but until that times comes I can not tell what reason there may be.

Mr. WARREN. I did not know but that the Senator would tell us at this time what the American people were going to do about it next time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. Mr. President, it seems to me that this ghost ought to be buried. It seems to me that it ought to be buried with the "bloody shirt"; it ought to be buried with the "mercantile theory"; it ought to be buried with a lot of other fool things in which humanity has from time to time been persuaded to believe.

I do not believe that there is in the world an honest man, with full information, who believes that the panic of 1893 was due to the passage of the Wilson bill in 1894. That depression began in 1890. I remember distinctly when Gen. Weaver was making a speech in Meridian, Miss., that I asked him to divide the time with me, and he declined. That was in 1891, when he said, as I quoted him a moment ago, that he had counted his audiences in the West and in the Northwest "not by the thousand, but by the acre," and he was telling the truth. He had counted them by the acre because the agricultural population of this country was in a condition of distress and suffering that it had never known previously in the history of the United States. At that time Cleveland's election was not even dreamt of; a reform of the tariff was not even horoscoped. The Populist Party grew in strength in the State of Mississippi until it threatened to carry it like a prairie fire, and the only thing in the world that stemmed it was the fear of negro rule. Every Senator here remembers that. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I am sure, remembers the same condition in South Carolina, and every Senator here will remember a like situation all over the South.

Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech. I rose for the purpose of making a statement. The chairman of the Finance Committee has requested me to state that on Friday, when the Senate meets at 12 o'clock, the report of the majority on the tariff bill will be filed, and the Members of the Senate are generally invited to begin the debate upon the bill and its amendments as they come from the Senate committee.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2517) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 15, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, imbue us plenteously with energy, skill, courage, and help us to apply them unto wisdom, that we may work the works of righteousness and pass on our way rejoicing in the fruits of a well-ordered life upon which Thou canst look with approval, leaving behind us a record which those who shall come after us may follow with impunity. And Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 12, 1913, was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would it not be better to wait until after this bill is disposed of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand from the gentlemen in charge of the bill that it can be disposed of to-day and that the other matters that are pending can be disposed of to-day.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true, but if anything should happen by which it should not be, or if the Senate should not dispose of the bill to-day, it would be desirable to have the House meet before Friday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say to the gentleman that we can undo it by unanimous consent if desired. After this bill is disposed of there will probably be some debate on other matters that may be extended, and I would like to get the order made now, if there is no objection.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct a statement I made in the RECORD in regard to the Mulhall inquiry. It is not a correction of the RECORD, but a correction of a statement that I made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks unanimous consent to make a correction. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MURDOCK. Two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks two or three minutes in which to make a correction of a statement he made. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, during the pendency of the Mulhall inquiry resolution, while the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] was arguing a motion to make all the hearings open, I made the statement that one of the meetings or hearings of the Senate committee had been secret. I made that statement upon information which I had found in the morning Post, July 9, 1913, which was as follows:

The committee tried to bring out whether Lamar had any stock in the Steel Corporation about the time the investigation resolution was introduced, or held any Union Pacific or Southern Pacific recently or now.

EXPLAINS IN SECRET SESSION.

When the committee reassembled after luncheon it held an executive session, into which David Lamar was taken for questioning.

After the committee had listened to a confidential explanation of some of Lamar's testimony Chairman OVERMAN announced that it was not material and would not be made public. The questioning in public then was resumed.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, Chairman OVERMAN, of the lobby investigating committee of the Senate, has stated that there have been no secret sessions of the Senate committee save three, in which the matter of the admissibility of testimony was gone into, and no secret hearings. I make the correction, and am glad there are no secret hearings on the part of the committees, either in the Senate or in the House.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed a joint and concurrent resolution passed by the Missouri State Legislature at its last session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire to state that I offer it at the request of its author and wish to say that while I can indorse much that it contains, there are some of its contents to which I do not agree.

STATE OF MISSOURI,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Cornelius Roach, secretary of state of the State of Missouri, and keeper of the great seal thereof, hereby certify that the following pages contain a full, true, and complete copy of a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled "Joint and concurrent resolution asking Congress to call a constitutional convention or to submit to the several States through a congressional joint resolution, an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, correcting the manner in which the constitutionality of State enactments shall be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States," and that the journals of the proceedings of the house and senate of the forty-seventh general assembly show that said joint resolution was adopted.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of the State of Missouri. Done at the city of Jefferson, this 15th day of April, A. D. 1913.

CORNELIUS ROACH, Secretary of State.

House joint and concurrent resolution 23, forty-seventh general assembly.

Joint and concurrent resolution asking Congress to call a constitutional convention or to submit to the several States through a congressional joint resolution, an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, correcting the manner in which the constitutionality of State enactments shall be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Whereas a single judge of an inferior Federal court has time after time nullified and amended the solemn enactments of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Missouri and of other States of this Union, and has even destroyed provisions of the constitutions of the States, made after the most deliberate thought and study in convention or by the sober verdict of the whole people; and

Whereas this manner of destroying and amending the deliberate enactments of a sovereign State has no specific warrant in the Federal Constitution, and is not in keeping with the dignity of this State or of any other State of this Union; and

Whereas it is not in keeping with the spirit of free institutions that the ruling of an inferior Federal court shall nullify the deliberate acts of the people of a whole State; and

That in order to correct these evils, an amendment to the Federal Constitution, to be known as Article XVII, be proposed to the several States for their ratification or rejection, to wit:

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein) as follows: That we apply to the Congress of the United States and respectfully ask that an amendment to the Federal Constitution to correct these evils be proposed to the several States for their ratification, to wit:

To the Congress of the United States:

In pursuance of the rights reserved to themselves by the sovereign States of this Union, we, the representatives of the State of Missouri regularly met in general assembly, do hereby apply to you and respectfully ask that you either call a constitutional convention for the purpose of proposing to the several States of the Union the amendment to the Federal Constitution given below, or that you propose to the several States for their ratification, according to Article V of the Constitution of the United States, said amendment, to wit:

ART. XVII. No inferior Federal court shall have jurisdiction over questions involving the constitutionality or the validity of any State law; but a law of any State, when called in question as violating the Constitution of the United States, or as conflicting with any Federal statute, shall be certified immediately to the Supreme Court of the United States, and shall be given precedence over all other business before said court. No Federal court shall issue any writ of injunction, restraining the execution of any State law, and no appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, involving the validity or the constitutionality of the law of any State, shall operate as a supersedeas. Every question involving the rights of a State or the validity or constitutionality of a State law shall be decided by the concurring opinion of every member of the Supreme Court.

And be it further resolved, That every State in the Union be respectfully requested to join with us in this memorial to Congress, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the governor and secretary of state of each State, and to such general assemblies of States as are now in session, and to all other general assemblies of States as soon as they shall convene; and that copies be sent to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article that appeared in the Philadelphia North American on the visit of some Indian chiefs to that city. It is of some interest to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article out of the Philadelphia North American about some Indian chiefs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, just before the close of the last Congress an editorial appeared in The North American, of Philadelphia, on the North American Indian, which is well worth the thought of Members of Congress. The editorial was entitled "Justice to the Indian." When it appeared the close of the session was so near that it was too late to secure leave in that Congress to make the editorial a part of our national records. I therefore take the opportunity to do so in this Congress.

People generally feel little concern for the Indian. He has ceased to be an obstruction to the advancement of the white man. He is no longer to be found in the way, blocking what we call civilization. When I was a child of a year my father and mother entered the Indian country and helped to push the Indians back. This was not from any spirit of opposition to the Indian, but was with the same spirit that possessed the early settlers to get homes for themselves and their families. The Indian was compelled to get back farther. But in the district which I have the honor to represent there are several bands of Indians, and their rights have not been properly safeguarded by Congress. The rights of the Indians generally have not been regarded seriously when it was the desire of the white man to utilize the territory of the Indian. I wish to insert this editorial in the RECORD because I think it is most fitting to call our attention to the duty we, as Members of Congress, owe the Indian. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia North American, Feb. 27, 1913.]

JUSTICE TO THE INDIAN.

The visit of 30 Indian chiefs to Philadelphia this week was an event not only rarely picturesque but historically noteworthy. Like figures from the remote past, as indeed they were, they stood forth vividly for a moment against the background of busy modern enterprise, then passed on into the shadows of forgetfulness. But they left behind them thoughts which a boastful civilization may well ponder.

Whatever may be the glory of having built towering cities where the ancestors of these men knew the dim aisles of trackless forests, the fate of the Indian is a challenge and a lesson to the race which overwhelmed him. It is a happy circumstance that Pennsylvania is the one place in the country where the white man may look unashamed into the face of his predecessor, for it was here that the lands of the Indians were purchased, instead of being stolen, and that here was signed "the only treaty which was never sworn to and never broken."

Perhaps the most significant feature of the visit was the new spirit displayed by these representatives of an almost forgotten race. Grave dignity of demeanor was to be expected; it was characteristic that they viewed with outward impassiveness the wonders and the tumult of city life.

But those who mingled with them were impressed most by the freedom with which they spoke. The habitual taciturnity of the Indian was laid aside, and they poured out their hearts almost like children. These grim warriors and tribal statesmen, who had participated in the last hopeless struggles against resistless force and had felt the consuming hatred of merciless war, seemed for the first time to cast off restraint and forget past wrongs.

They seemed to believe at last that the "white brother" of kindly legend was a reality and that the friendship so often pledged was true. So the stoic silence of generations melted and the smoldering memories of dishonor on one side and savage reprisal on the other were quenched in good will.

No doubt the wonderful scene they had witnessed in New York had helped to create this new feeling. Even the stern repression of the Indian character and the sleepless sense of injury were not proof against that spectacle.

They took part there in impressive ceremonies beginning the erection of a magnificent monument, a memorial which will stand forever at the gateway of the Nation, an imperishable testimony to the nobility of their race. Within sight of the great city which typifies the remorseless civilization that succeeded their sovereignty they heard the Indian character extolled by the President of the United States and the thunder of guns saluting in their honor. It may well be believed that they felt for the first time that "allegiance to our common country" which was pledged in the final peace treaty they signed.

Yet this belated tribute, the worthy conception of a big-hearted American, carries a thought which is a rebuke to the Nation. Not a note of dissent is now heard when the President and his Cabinet, with representatives of the Army and Navy, unite to pay honor to the Indian. But only a few years ago such utterances as were heard at Fort Wadsworth would have startled the most sympathetic admirers of the red man and would have stirred furious protest among many thousands of patriotic Americans.

The significant fact is that these tributes are quite in harmony with the soundest historical records. They but echo the testimony of those who knew the Indian in the distant past, before he had learned the vices of civilization and seen the doom prepared for him. These things were written in the year 1683:

"If an European comes to see them or calls for lodgings at their house or wigwam, they give him the best place and first cut. If they come to visit us they salute us, "Good be to you." If you give them anything to eat or drink, well, for they will not ask; and, be it little or much, if it be with kindness, they are well pleased. * * *

"In liberality they excel. Nothing is too good for their friend. Wealth circulateth like the blood; all parts partake; and though none shall want what another hath, yet are they exact observers of property. Some kings have sold, others presented me with several parcels of land. The pay or presents I made were not hoarded by the particular owners, but, the neighboring kings and their clans being present, they consulted what and to whom they should give. So the kings distribute, and to themselves last.

"Do not abuse them, but let them have justice, and you win them. The worst is that they are the worse for the Christians, who have propagated their vices and yielded them tradition for ill and not for good things. * * * It were miserable, indeed, for us to fall under the just censure of the poor Indian conscience, while we make profession of things so far transcending."

Thus the Indian appeared to the just, discriminating intelligence of William Penn. Is it not remarkable that after two centuries the same verdict should be rendered by national consent?

Yet to citizens who have reached middle age, how strange do these eulogies appear! Twenty years ago the name of Indian was synonymous with cruel savagery. Fiction writers were no more emphatic than historians in ascribing to him the vices of treachery, falsehood, and dishonesty; they would hardly grant him a single virtue to redeem his character from utter depravity. And almost the sole basis for this picture was the cruelty undoubtedly used in Indian warfare.

But what made the Indian a remorseless enemy of civilization, if it was not the civilization which revealed itself as a remorseless enemy to him? Gen. Richard H. Pratt, who has spent a lifetime in advancing the welfare of the subjugated race, has said: "It is a great mistake to think that the Indian is born an inevitable savage. He is born a blank like all the rest of us."

Civilization found him possessing the traits of honor and hospitality and generosity, as described by William Penn, and it taught him how fatal were these qualities when opposed to greed. Instead of developing them, civilization mocked at them. It robbed him and then outlawed him. And when he retorted upon wrong with savagery, it blackened his character with unrestrained calumny.

The removal of the Indian from the path of progress was inevitable. But the significant fact is that his reputation for unredeemed cruelty and worthlessness kept pace accurately with the ruthless exploitation directed against his property.

Instead of doing its necessary work with justice, civilization degraded it by crimes of cunning and then tried to cover them by systematic slander. Not until the remnants of the race had been stripped of almost its last possessions did a decent public sentiment force recognition of the Indians' claims upon the Government and upon the white race for justice.

Now the Nation so far discerns the truth as to approve unanimously the paying to the Indian of the finest honor ever offered to a people. The plan of Rodman Wanamaker is inspired by an artistic sympathy and deep sense of justice, which strike a responsive chord from one end of the country to the other. He serves his own people as well as those whom he honors by his far-visioned project of a great national memorial to the first owners of America.

That ownership was the Indian's real crime. It was his fatal misfortune to come too early upon the stage. If, instead of being found here by the first white men, he had come a century or two later, though he had come as a pauper refugee, his fate had been kinder.

The immigrant to-day finds law and order established for him, opportunity open for him, schools and hospitals free for him and his children. The Indian, possessing all the land, was robbed and hunted into the wilds and then maligned as a worthless creature, fit only to be destroyed by a beneficent civilization.

The most striking reparation that could be offered for these wrongs is now made possible through the munificence of one American who has the imagination to conceive and the heart to execute it. Can it be doubted that his great thought is another manifestation of the awakening spirit of justice which is felt throughout the world?

Civilization habitually justifies its treatment of the Indian on the ground of economic necessity. It is true that the red man was not a developer and that the vast resources of this country were needed for the upbuilding of a new and stronger race.

But let us be slow to boast of a civilization which has squandered the treasures of the land as ours has done; which has permitted the growth of a system of exploitation almost as cruel as that inflicted upon the Indians, and which tolerates social wrongs more relentless than the savagery the aborigines inflicted upon their worst enemies.

While the slavery of women and children and the infliction of deadly conditions of life upon countless human beings are defended as necessary to our progress, it is permitted to doubt whether our concept of the divine purpose and of justice is vastly higher than that of—

"The poor Indian, whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind."

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP] asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 162.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings be, and it is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It has not been usual, I think, to grant this privilege to committees on expenditures. I think I have never known the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings to have such a privilege accorded to it before it is required to have printing done. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if that committee has had this privilege before?

Mr. KONOP. It has had. It had it in the last Congress.

Mr. MANN. What is to be gained by it?

Mr. KONOP. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings at the last session had an investigation on the proposition of standardizing public buildings, and as the result of that investigation much information was gained and a unanimous report was given to the House which was of great benefit to the Members.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that if the privilege to have printing and binding done is to be granted to all committees of the House, it ought to be done by a general rule in the rules, instead of requiring every committee to get unanimous consent. If the privilege is granted to this committee, I know of no other committee which should not have it. However, I shall not object.

Mr. KONOP. I think most of the other expenditure committees have had a similar resolution passed. I think all of them have had.

Mr. MANN. I think a few of them have had.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to ask, Has the gentleman ever made any investigation as to what it costs? These resolutions are very frequent. What is the expenditure involved in one of these resolutions carrying that provision?

Mr. KONOP. I have not heard.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the gentleman heard anything about a new order which provides that no embossed stationery shall be furnished?

Mr. KONOP. No; I have not.

Mr. MANN. I can give the gentleman some information on that subject.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like to know how much one of these resolutions really costs the Government on an average.

Mr. MANN. I recently made inquiries at the Printing Office as to the difference between the cost of printing embossed letterheads and embossed envelopes and letterheads and envelopes with plain printing upon them. The difference in the cost is startling. I long ago have ceased to use embossed stationery, because I thought it was not fair to the Government to have stationery embossed at high expense, which I would not use if I had to pay for it out of my own pocket.

Shortly after I made this inquiry and this information was furnished to me the Joint Committee on Printing issued an order that no more embossed stationery should be furnished, as I understand, either to the committees or to the departments. I hope that is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask what was the difference in cost?

Mr. MANN. As I recollect, embossed letterheads cost something over $5 a thousand, and the printing, I believe, without the paper being furnished, costs something less than $1 a thousand.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman how much the printed stationery costs on an average, or the printing under one of these resolutions for printing and binding?

Mr. MANN. Every committee now has the authority, without these resolutions, to order stationery printed for the use of the committee. There used to be a limit on the order, of 5,000 copies at any one time, of any one kind. A committee could order several kinds at the same time, or after ordering one kind one day could repeat the order the next day, and I think probably they never had any difficulty in getting the stationery printed. Under this resolution there is no limit on the amount which they may order at one time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. About this printing resolution?

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to make an inquiry about the pending measure. As I understand it, stationery can not be printed on the order of a committee or the chairman of a committee. It must go through the hands of the Chief Clerk and be approved by him, and the Printing Office must have the approval of the Chief Clerk before stationery can be printed.

As to the printing of hearings and documents of that kind, the committee can order the printing without the intervention of the Chief Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 30,000 copies of the bill H. R. 3321, with amendments, as reported in the Senate July 11, 1913, 20,000 copies for the use of the House and 10,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. LAFFERTY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of Thomas W. Botkin (H. R. 18889), second session Sixty-second Congress, and the papers in the case of Daniel J. Cooper (H. R. 3630), first session Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MEDIATION, CONCILIATION, AND ARBITRATION.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 2517) providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the two amendments which have been agreed upon by all the parties directly interested in this legislation and agreed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary be offered at the proper time, and that no other amendment to the bill be allowed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2517 and consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole, to offer two amendments which have been agreed upon by everybody in interest, and that no other amendments be offered. Is there objection?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and realizing the urgency of this measure, I want to state to the House that there are a number of other organizations, which are interested in the passage of an amendment to the Erdman Act, that would like to come in under the provisions of that act, and that have in mind amendments to this bill. These gentlemen realize the urgency of this measure. The organizations involved are the commercial telegraphers, the shop employees of the various railroads of the country, and the freight handlers. Those organizations intend in the near future to have introduced into this House an amendment to the Erdman Act for the purpose of taking care of the men that are not alone members of their organizations, but also those that are nonmembers. I make this statement at this time on account of the nature of the request for unanimous consent, it shutting out all other amendments. These gentlemen will come in after this bill has passed both houses and been signed by the President, and will ask consideration in reference to their proposed amendments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the gentleman asks unanimous consent that this shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and that two amendments, and two only, shall be offered to the bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. There will be opportunity to vote upon those amendments, of course?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman contemplates some debate?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, and uttering the spirit that was manifested yesterday in the conference upon this matter at the White House, it is the desire of everybody interested in the legislation, and it is recognized as necessary for the good of the country, that the legislation be enacted speedily. I had a conference with the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but was unable to see the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] prior to the meeting this morning. The gentleman from Illinois and myself, as the result of what we learned in the conference yesterday, and on account of the sentiment of those interested most directly in the legislation, in view of the urgent nature of the matter now before the House, concluded that perhaps one hour of debate, which I suppose will be under the control of the chairman of the committee, would be ample time in which to make any explanation of the bill that is necessary. I am quite willing to say at this time that of that hour, if that be the understanding, the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kansas will be accorded such time as they may wish.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not contemplate shutting off debate on the amendments themselves?

Mr. CLAYTON. Not at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. If debate is in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, I take it that under the rules I could not cut off debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, anything could be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama and to all gentlemen concerned that when this gets into the House as in Committee of the Whole debate will be limited to five minutes, except by unanimous consent. The Chair suggests that the gentleman better embody in his request the time for the length of debate.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will modify it by saying that at the expiration of an hour the amendments be brought to a vote, and that after the amendments are disposed of by vote the bill as then amended, or as unamended, as the case may be, be put upon its final passage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, of course, as the Speaker has suggested, if the gentleman's request be granted, there will be no general debate, but debate will be under the five-minute rule. The Senate meets at 2 o'clock to-day. It is desirable, if practicable, to have this bill go to the Senate and reach there immediately after it meets, so that the Senate may agree to the amendments which are proposed, if they are agreed to here, in order that the bill may then be enrolled and signed by the Speaker and the Vice President while the two bodies are in session to-day, so that, if possible, the enrolled bill may be presented to the President to-night.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, that can be done under the last request made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; there will be time enough for anybody to be heard.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, before consent is granted I would like to have the Clerk report the amendments that have been agreed to, as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee states, by all of the parties concerned. I am taken somewhat unaware by such a radical agreement as would foreclose any amendment, having intended to offer an amendment in one or two places to this bill along the lines provided for in the Erdman Act, which have not been incorporated in either the Senate bill or in the House bill introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps my explanation may satisfy the gentleman without the necessity of reading the amendments at this time. The bill as it passed the Senate is the bill now under consideration, not the bill in the exact language as it was originally introduced in the Senate and originally introduced into the House. As a result of the conference at the White House yesterday it is proposed that the bill as it passed the Senate be amended in two particulars and two only. As the bill passed the Senate in one section it is required that certain of the original papers used in an arbitration be filed in the district court of the appropriate district, and then in a subsequent clause of the bill there is a provision that the same original papers be filed with the board of mediation and conciliation, a thing impossible to do, because the original papers can not be in two places at the same time. This amendment therefore alters the bill, so as to provide that certified copies of these papers used in the arbitration may be filed with the board of conciliation and mediation.

The other amendment simply seeks to restore what is now in the Erdman law. The draftsman of this bill, which we now have before us, it seems omitted by some unintentional error to carry forward into the bill a provision which is in the Erdman law, and which was at the time of the enactment of the Erdman law deemed to be a salutary provision. It is deemed now to be at least a safe provision to carry into this bill. That provision is that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the use of injunctive or other court process to compel any employee to perform labor. It might be said that such a provision is unnecessary, but it was thought to be necessary in the original law. It certainly will do no harm. It was thought to be unnecessary because of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which abolishes involuntary servitude, and it was argued that it is not within the power of the courts to compel a man to labor against his will.

But it was suggested in answer to that that the provisions of this bill seek to make the award, and to have a judgment of the court predicated upon award. It is possible to do that. Out of abundance of caution, so that this may not in anywise be construed as to give the courts the power to compel personal service on the part of any employee, it was deemed wise to put back in this bill that provision of the Erdman law to which I have adverted.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's explanation is complete as to the two amendments that are to be offered to the Senate bill. I would like to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee as to whether the Judiciary Committee gave any consideration to that proviso in the Erdman Act which provides for the appointment of arbitrators when there are two or more organizations or classes of employees involved? This provision is found on page 31 of the Senate report, and is not incorporated in the Senate or House bill. It reads as follows:

Provided, however, That when a controversy involves and affects the interest of two or more classes and grades of employees belonging to different labor organizations, such arbitrator shall be agreed upon and designated by the concurrent action of all such labor organizations; and in cases where the majority of such employees are not members of any labor organization, said employees may by a majority vote select a committee of their own number, which committee shall have the right to select the arbitrator on behalf of said employees.

At the bottom of page 5 of the House bill that the gentleman introduced we have some provision for a——

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Controversy between employees not members of any labor organization, but there is no provision in either the Senate or House bill that relates to the agreement as to arbitrators where the employees are connected with different labor organizations, as provided in the Erdman Act.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I may say in reply to the gentleman that he is reading from a bill which is not before the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, the Senate bill and——

Mr. CLAYTON (continuing). Hence I have some difficulty in keeping up with his references. The pages are not exactly alike.

Mr. STAFFORD. The House bill are identical in phraseology, except as to those matters stricken out and new amendments offered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Substantially, but not exactly as to phraseology, in accord with the Senate bill as it passed the Senate. I have before me a copy of the bill in the exact words in which it passed the Senate, and I have not the copy——

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any provision made in that bill for the matter to which I have just referred as incorporated in the present Erdman Act?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think the general provisions of the bill take care of that matter, Mr. Speaker. I think section 3 takes care of it, and I think the gentleman will find no trouble about it, but that it is provided for in section 3 and other sections of the bill.

I wish to say to the gentleman, furthermore, that the committee considered the House bill and the Senate committee considered the Senate bill. The five brotherhoods of railroad employees were represented at these different hearings for the most part by the chiefs of those brotherhoods, and also the Secretary of Labor was there, and Mr. Seth Low, president of the Civic Federation, was there, and Judge Knapp also attended these hearings. Everybody knows the remarkable and good work which the latter has done in these arbitration matters heretofore. Now, this bill is the concrete expression of the desire or wishes of those most directly interested in this sort of legislation, to wit, the great transportation companies of the country and the railroad employees themselves. They think, and I will agree with them in that opinion, that the machinery is ample to take care of the contingencies which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has suggested, and they are unwilling to have the text of this bill altered. I think I violate no confidence when I say that it was suggested yesterday in that conference that certain amendments be made to this bill; for instance, to put in the shopmen, and to put in the telegraphers specifically, and it was objected to, not that such legislation is objected to, but that it would delay or hazard possibly the passage of this bill.

It was frankly stated by more than one gentleman yesterday in conference with the railroad companies—and they were represented by a number of presidents of the leading railroads of the East—that they would act under this bill and agree to arbitrate the differences in the pending strike which is now about to be ordered on the part of the railroad employees on some 54 railroads if the bill were amended in the two particulars that I have specified; but they declined to say that they would act on that bill if other amendments were offered. And the same view was expressed by the brotherhoods present, and I believe of the five interested in the pending strike four were represented by heads of the brotherhoods being actually present, and the fifth one was there by a proper representation. They all agreed that the railroads and the operatives would arbitrate under this bill, and perhaps thereby avert the most serious strike that the country has ever been confronted with, but they would not possibly—and I think one gentleman said in all probability—arbitrate under it if the text of this bill was altered except in the two particulars I have named.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. It has occurred to me in running over this bill that the objection made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is answered in this wise: This bill provides, which the Erdman Act did not do, for a stipulation for an agreement relative to arbitration. That agreement among the employees, of course, embraces all the employees, organized and unorganized, and all the different classes who have a grievance and who desire to submit the matter to arbitration. Section 4 of this act contains the provisions of that agreement to arbitrate, and when that agreement to arbitrate is entered into, as a matter of course all of the employees party to that agreement agree among themselves as to how other members of the board of arbitration shall be appointed, and therefore it is not necessary to particularize or specify, as the Erdman Act did, the way in which they are to be appointed, because there must be an agreement, the whole affair being voluntary, among all of the employees as to all the matter in controversy before there can be any beginning.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there does not have to be an agreement as to all the employees. What this act provides for and what the Erdman Act provides for is for an agreement where a majority of employees are involved. I do not believe the present act provides for the case designated and pointed out by me.

Mr. MONDELL. It appears that the gentleman has only read section 4.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has read section 4 of both bills. Perhaps the gentleman from Wyoming has not. But, Mr. Speaker, in the exigency of the present railroad situation I shall not force an amendment of this kind upon the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire at least to protest against the Progressives of this House, of whom I am one member, being tied by an agreement where they are in no way represented. It is all right in a great and important measure like this, and, I suppose, it is necessary for conferences to be had and for us to be tied up. But in this particular case I notice that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as the leader of the minority of this House, has been called into conference and has been considered, and that he has given consent for the Republican Members of this body, but the leader of the Progressives has not been considered or consulted in any way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who is at fault for his not being considered? Wherein is the fault that he was not considered?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know who is at fault, but I know that he was not considered.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the Progressives are opposed to this measure?

Mr. MURDOCK. They are not; certainly not.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course we are for the measure. The Progressives, I suppose, are considered by the able and distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and by the equally able and distinguished leader of the Republican 3,000,000 minority to be so thoroughly awake to all good measures that they can be relied upon and depended upon to stand by everything that is patriotic and right. But I say that when these details are considered and agreed to the leader of the 4,000,000 minority ought to be considered and recognized in these conferences.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it is fair, Mr. Speaker, to say that I had an invitation to this conference of which the gentleman from Washington is not aware. Through a mistake I did not receive word until it was too late to attend. I had told the gentleman I was not invited. Afterwards, when I learned of my in itation, I did not inform him.

Mr. BUTLER. He ought to have been told.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], I would like to say I did not understand that I was asked to the conference because I was the Republican leader in the House. I had understood I was asked to the conference because I had given a great deal of attention to these bills and to this matter. For a good many years I have been frequently consulted by gentlemen who are identified with these propositions, both by Dr. Neill, by Judge Knapp, by the Secretary of Labor, and by many of the railroad organization officials and others. I did not undertake to bind any Republican or any Progressive or any other Member of the House by anything I agreed to, so far as I am concerned, and I am sorry——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman proceeds——

Mr. MANN (continuing). That one of the brightest Members of the House, but a new Member, insists upon injecting politics into a situation like this.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, just one word. This matter has been twice considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. It was considered as late as this morning, and the whole explanation that I have made here to the House was made to the Committee on the Judiciary. The matter was discussed and considered by the members of that committee. They concurred in the wisdom of the course proposed to-day. At that meeting of the committee the Progressive Party was ably and well represented in the person of that excellent gentleman from New York, Mr. CHANDLER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent to take Senate bill 2517 from the Speaker's table and to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole with permission to offer two amendments, all others to be shut out, and general debate to last one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER. I rise to reserve the right to object. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] one question. I came into the Chamber while the gentleman from Alabama was speaking and do not know what information he has given the House. As I understand, there was a meeting of railroad presidents and representatives of railroad employees yesterday in this city?

Mr. CLAYTON. There was.

Mr. COOPER. And they agreed that this bill, with the proposed amendments, might be enacted into law with their approbation?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would not state it that way. I would state that they desired it, and that they asked Congress to pass it in this form in order that the greatest strike that has ever confronted the country might possibly and in all probability be averted.

Mr. COOPER. But did those gentlemen, or the majority of them, sign a paper in writing to that effect, or was that simply an oral agreement?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will tell the gentleman just exactly what happened. No; there was no instrument of writing whatever, and there was no formal agreement as such. There was no discussion as to the particular text, written or unwritten, to be employed in the agreement. But the conclusion was reached by the people representing the great railroad corporations of the country, some fifty-four in number, and the five brotherhoods of railroad employees, that they could not arbitrate under the Erdman law as it now stands, and, therefore, they appealed to Congress to so amend that law of arbitration as that the parties to the pending controversy might arbitrate under a law acceptable to each side.

Mr. COOPER. Then, did they specifically agree to or approve the amendments that have been mentioned this morning?

Mr. CLAYTON. They did; and they were read. I have read those amendments word for word, and noted the places in the bill where they were to come, and asked if it was to be understood by all present that I, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, should offer these amendments in this House, and it was unanimously assented to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Will the bill be read afterwards for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement is that there may be one hour's debate. No agreement was made as to the control of the time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask how much time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will want, and how much time the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will want?

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman from Oklahoma

[Mr. MORGAN], ranking minority member of the committee, control the time on this side.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time will my colleague from Oklahoma desire?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I suggest that the time be divided equally.

Mr. CLAYTON. There are three parties to the agreement, and I should like to accommodate all.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] how much time he desires?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think we will need about 15 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Can you not get along with 10 minutes and give us 20 or 25 minutes?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. How much time will the gentleman from Alabama give to this side?

Mr. CLAYTON. One gentleman has asked me for 10 minutes, and in view of the fact that possibly there are other members of the committee who may want some time, I would like, if I may, to have at my disposal 30 minutes, but I want to be agreeable, both to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. We are willing to take 25 minutes. Can the gentleman from Kansas get along with 10 minutes?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; I can get along with 10 minutes. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma want 25?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas speak loud enough so that the Chair can hear?

Mr. MURDOCK. I was addressing my remarks to the gentleman from Oklahoma rather than to the Speaker, because, as I now understand, the gentleman makes the proposition that he shall have 25 minutes. Is that it?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That I have 25 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas 10 minutes. That would be about the fair proportion.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Then the understanding is that the gentleman from Alabama has 25 minutes, the gentleman from Oklahoma 25 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas 10 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of common knowledge that the greatest railroad strike in the history of our country is now threatened, involving, I believe, every railroad east of the Mississippi and north of the Potomac Rivers, involving thousands of railroad employees engaged in the operation of trains in that large portion of our country covered by the railroads to which I have referred.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gravity of the situation is apparent to this House, and that both branches of Congress are ready, with all decent haste, to pass this legislation, which it is believed will avert what we may term a national calamity.

The time has passed when there could be a strike of any considerable magnitude on the railroads of the country in which no one was concerned except the railroads and their employees. That is a matter I need not dwell upon, because it goes without saying that it is a matter of great concern to the people of the whole country, regardless of their occupations or pursuits.

I desire to say another thing, Mr. Speaker, that, I believe, in the whole history of congressional legislation there has never been an act proposed that was more far-reaching in its nature or more beneficent in its character than this.

I believe it marks a new era in the settlement of industrial disputes. I believe it will do more to show to the great corporations of the country and to their industrial workers the wisdom of settling their disputes without resorting to the warfare of an actual strike than anything that has ever been suggested. Mr. Speaker, surely this is a consummation devoutly to be wished. I hope that by this legislation we can teach the lesson to the workingmen of our country and to the capitalists in control of the corporations of the country that it is better to have a peaceful settlement of a dispute rather than a great industrial warfare; and that such a method of settlement is not only theoretically right, but that it can be made practical in all its accomplishments.

When we have done that we have gone further than any other piece of legislation has gone toward teaching the wholesome doctrine of mediation and conciliation, of arbitration, and of peaceful, costless settlement. I say costless, because the mere cost of the officials required under this bill is a bagatelle, and it will avert that great and calamitous cost of interrupting the business of the country, and avert that equally great and calamitous cost of throwing out of employment thousands of men who have the right to labor and who have also the right to have their grievances heard and redress given to them if their cause be just.

Mr. Speaker, that is this bill. Its origin is easily stated. Under the Erdman law there were, I think, some 60 strikes settled. For a number of years that law was not used, because the corporations and the employees would not trust its efficacy, and they were not willing to trust the men who constituted the board of mediation and conciliation. They doubted the men and they doubted the remedy.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would permit me to complete this brief statement, and then I will be very glad to yield. As I said, for some years the Erdman law, which was approved June 1, 1898, was unused for the reasons stated. Then resort was had to it, and I want to pause here long enough to pay a deserved tribute to Judge Knapp and to Dr. Neill for the wise manner in which they made the Erdman law an efficient remedy in the settlement of disputes in many cases. As time went on, however, this fact was developed. In one controversy between the railroads and certain of their employees the railroads objected to operate under the law, because it provided for only three arbitrators. The railroads suggested to this brotherhood that they have an arbitration in the nature of common-law arbitration and arbitration independent of the Erdman law. That arbitration was had, and it was composed of seven members, the larger number to meet the wishes of the railroads. That did not work well, and for this reason: There was no sanction of authority of the Federal Government for that arbitration. It was held without the sanction of law.

The result of it was not satisfactory, for while the arbitrators took the testimony in the case in 14 days, they were 7 months before they rendered their award, and their award I think in some other particulars was unsatisfactory to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, one of the complaining parties. But be it said to the credit of that great organization and to the high-minded man who then headed it and to the high-minded man who now heads it, that brotherhood acquiesced in that award and lived up to it faithfully.

When this new controversy comes on, the railroads say they will not arbitrate under the Erdman law, because an arbitration board of three men means an arbitration involving a multitude of railroads and thousands of employees, and questions which shall be decided by one of those three men. That is the practical effect of it. The railroads select one and the employees select one, and then the umpire or the third man would settle a question of momentous consequences and of far-reaching effect. So it was said that, granting the necessity for arbitration, yet controversies arise to be arbitrated that are far-reaching beyond anything ever contemplated when the Erdman law was originally passed, and both sides agreed that it would be better to have an arbitration board of six, and that is what is agreed to in this bill.
